or killed in the faithful discharge of their duty should accompany the report, but let us not misunderstand it. Nobody has ever heard of a sheriff or a police officer using a shotgun on the State highway to arrest a murderer or bank thief or robber or any man who formerly came under the classification of a felon. It has only been in the enforcement of this new law that there has been this official lawlessness.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HAWES. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. How many men were killed before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment in trying to collect the taxes on liquor or trying to arrest the moonshiners who were violating the law, as compared with the number who have been killed since?

Mr. HAWES. I have no record, but I want to go on record as saying——

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator talks like prohibition was responsible for this so-called outbreak of peace officers trying to make people obey the law, as if prohibition brought it on. Everybody knows there is an organized propaganda in the country to discredit prohibition. It is as widespread as any propaganda ever loosed on the American public.

Mr. HAWES. Is the Senator asking me a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and I thought the Senator said he could not answer it.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask the Senator again how many people were killed by moonshiners and how many officers were killed, and how many officers killed moonshiners prior to the adoption of the eighteenth amendment? The Senator talks like this killing was something which had been developed since the eighteenth amendment became a part of the Constitution.

Mr. HAWES. Never in my recollection have men pursuing moonshiners in the old days or pursuing a murderer or a bank robber on the public highways of this city or the cities of other States used shotguns and rifles.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Is not that a matter which has been induced largely by the methods of the rum runners themselves? They did not formerly use shotguns and rifles and destructive weapons such as are being used now against officers, and the officers necessarily have to compete with them in the character of weapons they use.

Mr. HAWES. I say I do not believe there is a sheriff or deputy sheriff in Florida or in Arkansas who would not be driven out of office if he fired on a criminal with buckshot.

Mr. CARAWAY. And I am equally certain there is not one down there who would advocate violation of the prohibition law who would not also be driven out of office.

Mr. HAWES. Does the Senator from Arkansas charge me with defending violation of the law?

Mr. CARAWAY. I am not particular about it, but I say there is a propaganda going all over the country to discredit every officer who tries to enforce the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. HAWES. I will say that the Senator from Arkansas is mistaken. No statement has been made on the floor of the Senate since I have been here that did not give the facts, the conditions, the incident, and the crime.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; and the Senator uses that as if it were something that was solely due to prohibition, and that such a crime was unknown in this country until prohibition became a part of the law of the land. He emphasizes the matter as if there never had been a crime committed until prohibition became the law of the land, and that all of our lawlessness is due to prohibition.

Mr. HAWES. By no stretch of the imagination can any man who heard my remarks so construe them. I have stated in the Senate that I voted for all law-enforcement measures, that I was in favor of this investigation; but I say that the shooting of men on the public highway by officials of the United States is a new crime.

Mr. CARAWAY. And I ask the Senator if the smoke screens are not a new crime where men are imperiling the lives of their fellow citizens who are trying to enforce the law and trying to protect our highways when these other men are trying to run rum over them?

Mr. HAWES. I say that the use of shotguns on the public highway in the enforcement of laws against other crimes is a new method on the part of our Government officers.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not the Senator know that the carrying of smoke screens up and down the highways to protect rum runners is done for no other purpose than to protect the illegal sale of liquor?

Mr. HAWES. Will the Senator answer my question or refuse to answer it?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will answer it, but I want to know if there is a peculiar crime committed that requires the use of force? I want to ask the Senator this question——

Mr. HAWES. Will the Senator answer my question first?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; I have already answered it.

Mr. HAWES. No; the Senator has not. If he did, I have not heard it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did answer it; and if the Senator did not listen to it, of course I can not help it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I want to make an appeal to my friend, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], to permit the pending joint resolution to go over. It will stand as the unfinished business. Am I right in that statement, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. The joint resolution will stand as the unfinished business when we meet on the 19th of August. That will be one month before the House meets, and the Senator from Washington will have ample opportunity then to have his joint resolution passed. I wish to appeal to him now to let it go over, because there must be an executive session in order to transact business of importance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that I appreciate the situation, and in view of that situation, I am perfectly willing that the joint resolution should go over as the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar days of June 17 and 18 may be considered as approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. McKELLAR. The resolution of the junior Senator from Nebraska has not been considered.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be a very easy matter to revert to that, as I suppose the executive session asked for by the Senator from Indiana will be an open executive session?

Mr. WATSON. It will be.

Mr. NORRIS. It will be a very easy matter when executive business shall have been concluded to go on with other business.

Mr. WATSON. That is just what I intended to say.

Mr. NORRIS. So that Senators will have an opportunity after the conclusion of the executive session to present matters in which they may be interested.

Mr. WATSON. That is what I desired to say. This is the first time we have had an opportunity to operate under the new rule of considering executive business in open session. After the conclusion of open executive session, the Senator from Nebraska may offer his resolution, other Senators may present their measures, and we may then proceed with such other business as may come before us. Inasmuch as we are to transact executive business in open session, it will not amount even to a hiatus in the proceedings. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate sundry messages from the President transmitting Executive nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees, and which appear at the end of to-day's Senate proceedings.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, have the nominations that have come in respect to the Navy been laid down?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have just been handed down.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was about to make a request as to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will request the Senator to wait until that order is reached. Reports of committees are in order.

NOMINATION OF FREDERIC A. TILTON

Mr. MOSES. Before reaching that order, Mr. President, in the message of the President to-day there is the nomination of Mr. Tilton to be Third Assistant Postmaster General, is there not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. MOSES. It is the same nomination that was received the other day and confirmed; but there was a typographical error in the name of Mr. Tilton, I believe, the letter "k" being added to his first name, which should be spelled "F-r-e-d-e-r-i-c." The nomination is now sent in again merely for the purpose of correcting the typographical error. I ask unanimous consent that the nomination may be immediately considered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, has the Senator conferred with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] concerning this nomination?

Mr. MOSES. I did when it came in previously.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Senator from Iowa this morning——

Mr. MOSES. If I may interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin, he is mistaken about the nominee. I conferred with the Senator from Iowa about the Tilton nomination when it came in the other time erroneously. The nomination which the Senator from Wisconsin has now in mind is the nomination of Mr. Philp, the present postmaster at Dallas, Tex., to be Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I talked with the Senator from Iowa about that, and he is entirely satisfied that the nomination shall go through.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NOMINATION OF JOE H. CALLOWAY

Mr. McKELLAR. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I report the nomination of Joe H. Calloway to be postmaster at Springfield, Tenn., and I ask unanimous consent that it may be confirmed and the President notified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POST-OFFICE NOMINATIONS

Mr. MOSES. In behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS], the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I report favorably certain nominations for postmasters and ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall have to insist that the nominations be read.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Arkansas that the slips of the nominations which I have just sent to the desk comprise only those slips which have been submitted to Senators from the States interested, and have received their approval and have come back to the committee room on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In view of that statement, I have no objection to the consideration of the nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the nominations are confirmed.

NOMINATIONS OF ASSISTANT POSTMASTERS GENERAL

Mr. MOSES. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, in behalf of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] I report two nominations favorably, and I ask unanimous consent for their present consideration. I will ask that they may be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The names will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. John W. Philp, of Texas, to be fourth assistant postmaster general.

Mr. MOSES. I invite the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the nomination. This is the one which I think he had in mind a few moments ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] is now on the floor.

Mr. MOSES. I invite the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the nomination of the postmaster at Dallas, Tex., to be Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed. The clerk will state the second nomination reported by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Arch Coleman, of Minneapolis, Minn., to be First Assistant Postmaster General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NOMINATION OF EMIL S. HELBURN

Mr. SACKETT. From the Committee on Finance, I report the nomination of Emil S. Helburn to be collector of internal revenue at Louisville, Ky., and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is this the case which was before the committee some days ago?

Mr. SACKETT. It is; and the subcommittee had a hearing on it and approved it unanimously, and the full committee has likewise approved it.

Mr. KING. Were the statements which were made before the committee fully examined into by the subcommittee?

Mr. SACKETT. They were. The subcommittee had the report of the grand jury and everything else which was pertinent before it, heard a number of witnesses, and, I think, went into the matter thoroughly.

Mr. KING. And there was nothing to justify the charges made?

Mr. SACKETT. No, sir.

Mr. KING. And the nomination was approved by the junior Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SACKETT. It was approved both by my colleague and myself.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah, having brought this matter to the attention of the Finance Committee, because of a telegram I received from Mr. H. Green Garrett, of Kentucky, that there is no reason why this nomination should not be confirmed. A subcommittee was appointed to hear any complaint, but no one appeared as a witness against Mr. Helburn.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah what was the nature of the charges?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, they were somewhat nebulous. One of them was a charge which I think ought never to have been brought, and I do not think it worthy of being repeated here, but I felt, in view of one of the charges—I think it was stated the grand jury had made some investigation—that the matter should go to the subcommittee. The subcommittee having made an investigation, I am entirely satisfied.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to know what was the matter submitted to the grand jury for investigation?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I shall ask to have the doors closed, if this matter shall be gone into.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I was going to make a motion right now if this line of discussion is persisted in that we go into secret session.

Mr. SMITH. I am charged with voting on the confirmation of a nominee, and I want to know the facts.

Mr. MOSES. Very well; then if the Senator from California will make the motion, I will second it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, let me say that the report of the grand jury was simply a report upon the method of conducting business in a certain department of the State government. In Kentucky it is the duty of the grand jury to make a report upon the condition of the State offices. There was an investigation by the grand jury of the road department of which Mr. Helburn was a member. There was a general criticism of the methods employed by the road department made by the grand jury, but his name was not mentioned specifically in their report.

Mr. SMITH. What was the nature of the charges which they made?

Mr. BARKLEY. That the road department had relied too much upon the highway engineer for recommendations in the payment of bills instead of itself going into detail to determine whether they should be paid.

Mr. SMITH. Who was the beneficiary of the extra price?

Mr. BARKLEY. It was not a question of an extra price, so far as I know. That was not involved. It was a criticism leveled at the highway commission because they did not examine with sufficient care every specific bill presented for payment, but relied upon the State highway engineer for proper recommendations in matters of that sort. The grand jury recommended that the methods pursued be corrected in the future, but there was no specific charge against the individual members of the highway commission. It was a general criticism of the commission's methods.

Mr. SMITH. But the grand jury did find that he did not properly discharge his duty and obligation, and therefore they recommended a change in the method.

Mr. BARKLEY. The grand jury reported that the methods of paying bills were not sufficiently strict and recommended a change.

Mr. SMITH. I am not speaking about the whole membership.

Mr. BARKLEY. There was a report of the grand jury suggesting a correction of the methods which had been long in vogue in the highway commission.

Mr. SMITH. Very good, but he was a member of the highway commission and allowed that method to be followed which cost the taxpayers money and the grand jury recommended a correction. That is the kind of a man whose name is brought in here for us to confirm as an officer of the Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. The grand jury made recommendations as to other departments of the State government. They recommended that the highway commission correct the system criticized.

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about the other departments of the State government; none of the officers of the other departments are here for confirmation, but this man is. I am talking about this man whose name is brought here for confirmation as an officer of the Government. The grand jury recommended that the method which he pursued be corrected, and yet his name is brought here now and we are asked to confirm him as an officer of the Government with that kind of thing back of him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ADDITIONAL POST-OFFICE NOMINATIONS

Mr. GEORGE. By authority of the chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee I report certain nominations for postmasterships, and ask that they may be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed.

NOMINATION OF FERRY K. HEATH

Mr. COUZENS. I submit a report from the Committee on Finance, and ask for immediate confirmation of the nominee therein mentioned. I ask that the nomination be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Ferry K. Heath, of Grand Rapids, Mich., to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be confirmed.

NOMINATION OF WARREN N. CUDDY

Mr. STEIWER. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report the nomination of Warren N. Cuddy, of Alaska, to be United States attorney for the third division, district of Alaska, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] reported a nomination for district attorney in Alaska and asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I objected under a misapprehension. I now withdraw my objection and join in the request of the Senator for immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn, and without objection the nomination is confirmed.

NOMINATIONS OF JARVIS J. BAIN AND EDWARD A. DADAY

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I submit two reports, and ask for their immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Lieut. Col. Jarvis J. Bain, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, member Mississippi River Commission.

Edward A. Daday, temporary ensign in the Coast Guard of the United States, to take effect from date of oath.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed.

NOMINATION OF BEN F. CAMERON

Mr. NORRIS. From the Judiciary Committee I submit a favorable report upon the nomination of Ben F. Cameron, of Mississippi, to be United States attorney for the southern district of Mississippi, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of committees? If not, the Calendar is in order.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the confirmation en bloc of all postmasters' nominations on the Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed.

SUNDRY NAVAL NOMINATIONS

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I rise, at the request of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who is ill and absent. I think there are on the desk about 100 nominations of naval officers who were of the class of 1926, and automatically, by reason of three years' service as ensigns, are now regularly promoted. At the request of the Senator from Maine, I ask that these nominations may be now considered en bloc and approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Are they on the Calendar?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator why those nominations are not on the Executive Calendar? Have they been reported from the committee?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They have not gone to the committee. They came an hour ago. They are regular promotions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that they are routine promotions.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Routine promotions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] whether, under existing law, they would be entitled automatically to these promotions?

Mr. SWANSON. They are entitled automatically to these promotions. All appointments of this character in the Navy are made automatically. There are not any of the higher grades which require any discretion—appointments to the bureaus or otherwise. If the action requested by the Senator from California should not be taken, it would simply mean a great delay in the confirmation of the promotions of these officers.

Mr. KING. Their names have been transmitted to the Senate?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. They have been.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be confirmed.

(The naval nominations confirmed appear at the end of to-day's Senate proceedings.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. All resolutions of confirmation this day agreed to will be transmitted to the President of the United States.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate resume legislative session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana?

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative session.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR WALSH OF MONTANA ON HINTS TO YOUNG LAWYERS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting and able speech by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the graduating class of Suffolk Law School, Boston, Mass., June 6, 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address follows:

To the members of the graduating class: I congratulate you on completing your preparatory studies entitling you to enter into the ancient and honorable profession of the law, through which is administered justice, said by the most illustrious lawyer of this State to be the greatest concern of man on earth.

It is quite probable that many, if not most of you, contemplate the pursuit of the law as a means of gaining a livelihood, a perfectly praiseworthy purpose, but you should never forget that you are to become the ministers of justice, nor fail to be animated by a desire to make your career at the bar a service to your country and to humanity. It can not be doubted that the great Father of us all has a care that His children be fed and clothed and, accordingly, that all who by their daily toil contribute to their needs, physical and spiritual, are doing His work. And so it must be assumed that He is solicitous that justice be done among them and consequently that those who labor to see that it may prevail are equally workers in His vineyard.

I hope you are all confident of success in your chosen field and determined to attain it. A certain measure of assurance is all but a condition of success in any line and youth is privileged to indulge it. But if there are any among you who may entertain misgivings or harbor doubts, let me say for their comfort that, given no more than ordinary intellectual vigor and only such general preparation as is required for entrance to law schools like that from which you go out, no one need fear avoiding failure at the bar if he possesses two virtues—industry and integrity.

Those elusive peculiarities that go to make up what is sometimes denominated personality—facility, felicity and forcefulness in speech, graciousness in manner, and other qualities that contribute so materially to success at the bar—are very largely native, though not incapable of cultivation however niggardly nature may have been in her bestowal of them in individual cases. But industry and integrity anyone may have, and having them reasonable success is practically assured to one equipped as you are who devotes himself to the business and profession of the law.

There is a spur to effort in it that no other profession offers. The work of the lawyer is always subject to attack to the loss or even ruin, if successful, of his client; his every move in court subject to assault by his antagonist; his arguments open to refutation; and the frailty of any position he may take exposed in public to his discomfiture, if not his disgrace. He has accordingly every incentive to the most intensive and exhaustive study and preparation, and labors under conditions most favorable to intellectual development. He competes under the exhilaration of the strong man who delights to run a race.

Let me recur to what has been said of a purpose you should entertain to serve the cause of justice as well as to look to the monetary returns of your labors. Lose no opportunity at the outset of your career at least to get into court, however unpromising from a money standpoint may be your employment. Skill in the trial of lawsuits, either in respect to the development of the facts or in the presentation of questions of law, is acquired only by experience. Proficiency will be the reward of efforts on behalf of impecunious clients, even if you never realize anything else from them. Moreover, should you acquit yourself in a manner to gain the good will of the judge and jury, it is quite likely that they will commend you to better paying clients. Thus there would be laid the rudiments of a reputation for ability and efficiency—a priceless asset to a lawyer. In any event, you will have the satisfaction of having aided in and seeing that justice is done.

This leads me to express the hope that you may court the patronage of the needy litigant. The concentration of capital goes on apace. Industrial and commercial organizations of mammoth proportions are occupying almost every field in the business world. The influence they exert financially, socially, and politically, often insidious, is incalculable and defies estimate. For abundant reasons the press is rarely hostile to their cause, even though, as recent events have disclosed to be occasionally the case, they do not control that important source of public opinion. They command unlimited means and may and do employ the best legal talent. It is not rare, happily, in these days that under enlightened management they exhibit a tender regard for the rights of others, but instances are not wanting in which all the traditional arrogance of wealth is displayed by those charged with the conduct of their affairs. Drastic statutes have been enacted to restrain them in their eagerness to pile up profits. It is an unequal contest when the ordinary man, even though he be not wholly without means, becomes involved in a controversy affecting his personal or property rights with one of these gigantic corporations. The lawyer who, convinced of the justice of his cause, undertakes to represent him performs a service to his community as well as to his client, even though his fee be contingent on the success of the litigation. No one of sensibility can regard, except with revulsion, the indecent solicitation of business with which the profession is sometimes disgraced, usually by men as lacking in morals as they are in ability. But do not be deterred from engaging in what you conceive to be a meritorious cause because you must take a chance on being recompensed from whatever may be recovered, by the idle clatter about ambulance chasing. Much of it emanates from inferior men, tied by retainers to interests they are proud to serve, eager to free their clients from responsibility even for their wrongful or negligent acts, by establishing a false ethical standard, and thus forcing the indigent suitor to enlist the services of practitioners of little talent and less integrity or abandoning the effort to obtain justice.

I am prepared to contend that the lawyer whose services are available to the worthy poor upon a contingent fee deserves better of his country than his brother who can not be moved by a cause, however just, without receiving or being assured of a substantial fee, whatever unfortunate result may be the outcome of the litigation. The slightest reflection will convince anyone that in respect to certain classes of cases there rarely, if ever, would be any resort to the courts at all were it impossible to secure the services of a lawyer equal to the occasion upon a contingent-fee basis. Negligence cases resulting in death or personal injury are notoriously of that character. Patent-infringement cases are commonly, if not ordinarily, contests between some impecunious and improvident inventor and a powerful corporation or group of corporations making use of a device or process, the essential feature of which was, he claims, conceived by him, as certified in a patent from his government. Copyright cases not infrequently present situations quite similar. In the section of the country from which I come a hardy prospector, after years of patient toil and a lonely life in the wilderness, may find himself, as his ship is about to come in, confronted with a claim on the part of a ruthless mining company of superior right to the ground he calls his own because of some technical failure to comply with the law in making his location; or he may ascertain that under pretense of pursuing its extralateral right, by underground workings far below his, through adjacent property acquired after his discovery which revealed the values beneath the surface, it is fast extracting or has extracted the treasure which is rightly his, as he believes. If he can not find a competent lawyer who will take his case except upon a retainer and an agreement for compensation in any event, commensurate with the importance of the litigation and the labor involved, he is ruined. The reports of our courts are replete with cases presenting just such features. Other conditions calling equally for unfeed service may easily be conceived.

It must be realized that it is deplorable that justice should not be done in such cases that, being done, the idea should not prevail or obtain currency that the machinery of the law is contrived for the exclusive benefit of the rich and well-to-do, who may, with impunity, violate its injunctions and for the punishment exclusively of the poor and the lowly, who must, at their peril, walk in the straight and narrow path.

Upon similar considerations I am inclined to think he discharges the nobler duty who, as the representative of the sovereign people, brings to the bar of justice a culprit of great wealth or a defiant corporation pursuing a policy of monopoly in contravention of the law than he whose business it is, as tersely expressed by one thus engaged, to keep his rich clients out of jail.

An idea is prevalent both among the laity and in professional circles that a higher order of talent is required and displayed in the elucidation of the law, in the preparation of opinions and briefs, than in the development and establishment of the facts out of which differences arise concerning legal principles. Incident to this notion a standing in the profession is accorded to the one accomplished or reputed to be accomplished in the profundities of the law somewhat superior to that of the lawyer skilled or reputed to be skilled in trial work, and the antecedent investigation necessary to its successful prosecution.

The notion may be the offspring of the class system of England, in which a distinction is made between the solicitor and the barrister who is provided with a brief of the facts with references to the witnesses, by whom they are to be established, a plebeian kind of work unsuited, it is assumed, to the dignified lawyer who addresses the representative of the Crown in the person of the judge. More likely it springs from the fact that unusual skill in that line is sometimes exhibited and success achieved by lawyers of only very moderate knowledge of the law or lacking even in any training of consequence in the fundamentals, and who are forced to rely largely on their native talent and such learning as they may acquire by association with more accomplished and diligent students.

To my mind there is no just basis for such a view. Indeed a wide and accurate knowledge of the law is one of the conditions essential to success in the exposition of the facts making for the effective prosecution of a lawsuit.

Some notable instances have come under my observation in which lawyers of very considerable learning remained entirely oblivious of important and even determinative legal principles, involved in controversies, and consequently never brought to light the facts making them applicable. I am sometimes plagued with the thought that I may myself have been thus derelict. The failure is not so likely to be in not knowing the law as it is in overlooking it, in not having it in mind at all, in not associating the applicable principle with the facts developed or which might be developed. A well-stored mind is invaluable to the practitioner, but only if its treasures become available as the occasion requires. To make them so no exercise surpasses in effectiveness the trial of cases, demanding as it does the prompt utilization of every resource of the mind. It is singular with what accuracy the views of one touching any problem can be judged, knowing his attitude concerning questions more or less closely connected. Those harboring the notion that trial work is not quite in the same class with that of the recluse lawyer are quite likely to be found among those entertaining the conviction that the jury system is an anomaly and ought to be abolished. It is argued that a just conclusion is much more likely to be arrived at by a judge or judges, more capable from training and experience in analyzing and weighing evidence than is to be expected from a group of citizens who are without any special preparation for the tasks imposed upon them as jurors.

Lord Bryce, in his much-praised commentaries on American governmental institutions, concludes that our judicial system—speaking of the States generally—ought to be about as faulty as could well be imagined because of what he conceives to be its three weaknesses—the election of the judges by popular vote, their limited tenure, and the meager salaries they receive. He admits, however, that the effects are by no means as deplorable as might be anticipated, having in mind the evils upon which he descants. Indeed, he remarks, that seldom are the results so lamentable as might have been predicted. And having analyzed the factors which, in his judgment, serve to counteract or at least mitigate the evils likely to flow from the features adverted to, he remarks that as there are institutions which do not work as well as theoretically they ought, so there are others which work better. He might have instanced the royal family of England, the maintenance of which seems to the ordinary American mind a senseless burden upon the people of that country, seeing that no member of it performs any active function of government. And yet it is quite generally believed by Englishmen, at least, that it is the tie, tenuous though it be, that holds together the units of the British Empire, even if it does not subserve any other useful end.

So, although considerations may be advanced of apparent force against the jury system as an integral part of the machinery for the administration of justice, the universality of its use by English-speaking peoples, the continuity with which it has been employed from near-barbaric times, and the encomiums lavished upon it by jurists, statesmen, and philosophers ought to make one chary of urging its abandonment, however doubtful he may be of its value under modern conditions. It has been transplanted in every British colony and remains a feature of the jurisprudence of every self-governing country in which the influence of the English common law is felt.

In a more or less modified form it has been introduced into the judicial systems of many of the countries of continental Europe. It was so much in favor at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution that the wise and prudent framers of that immortal document, having guarded it against adverse congressional action as to crimes only, the seventh amendment, one of those added pursuant to assurances given to secure the ratification of the work of the convention, extended the guaranty so as to embrace all suits at common law in which the value in controversy should exceed $20.

Another amendment reasserted the principle expressed in the Constitution as it was adopted, elaborating it so as to assure to one charged with crime a speedy public trial in the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed. No State of the Union has failed to incorporate in its constitution a guaranty of the right of trial by jury, many of them specifically extending the right to civil as well as to criminal cases, evidencing an acceptance of the enthusiastic comment of Justice Story, who declared what he referred to as "the inestimable privilege of a trial by jury in civil cases" to be "a privilege scarcely inferior to that in criminal cases, which is counted by all persons to be essential to political and civil liberty."

The attachment to the principle, at least in criminal cases, undoubtedly has its root in the struggle for liberty in England. It was regarded, and doubtless proved to be, a bulwark against vengeful political prosecutions, often involving the death penalty, induced by resistance to the tyrannical acts of arbitrary sovereigns, or ensuing upon uprisings occasioned by such, or springing from the rivalries and ambitions of contenders for the throne. In the organization of our Government there was a dread, by no means uncommon, that the courts might be employed by those in power to punish their political enemies, particularly in view of the power reposed by the Constitution in the President to appoint all judges of the Federal courts.

It was no doubt recalled that juries had repeatedly braved the wrath of obsequious judges in their desire to ingratiate themselves with the reigning powers by an unwarranted exercise of the authority with which they had been clothed. Despite threats from the bench a jury had, in 1670, declined to convict William Penn of unlawfully preaching in the streets of London. The Colonies were electrified in 1735 by the return of a verdict of not guilty by a New York jury in a prosecution for libeling the governor of that State, somewhat notorious for his oppressive acts, though the judge, an appointee of the executive, denied to the defendant, the publisher of a newspaper, the right to establish the truth of the charge, and instructed the jury, in effect, to find the defendant guilty.

The Wilkes episode was of recent occurrence, and the enthusiasm aroused in America by the verdict in that case, and other features of it, still abounded. That the apprehensions thus felt were not unfounded were soon to be demonstrated in connection with prosecutions under the alien and sedition laws, and by the outrageous conduct of Judge Samuel Chase who, in 1804, was impeached by the House of Representatives and barely escaped conviction by the Senate.

It is a queer manifestation of the frailty of the human mind that, notwithstanding innumerable instances in which judges have exhibited partisanship in the very highest degree, and prejudice of the most inveterate character, there are those who assign to them the most heroic virtue, while at the same time attributing the juries the lack of every qualification for the duties with which they are charged. Unquestionably juries frequently fail to meet expectations, even just expectations, but so do judges. The results of the criminal trials in the District of Columbia, instituted in consequence of revelations made in the investigation into the leasing of the naval oil reserves and in kindred inquiries, were disappointing in the last degree—senseless indeed. But so was the decision of the Wyoming judge who found no reason in the facts developed for the cancellation of the lease of the Teapot Dome, his conclusion being contrary to that arrived at unanimously by the three judges of the circuit court of appeals and the seven justices of the Supreme Court sitting in the hearing of the cause before that tribunal.

The action of the juries gave rise to the most caustic criticism of the jury system and insistent demands for its abolition or drastic revision. No one, however, seemed to think that the strange judgment rendered in the court of first instance in that case offered any very sound reason for a radical change in our system for the trial of causes in equity or as affording any persuasive argument against appointive judges.

To my mind, the fundamental error in most of the attacks upon the jury system is in assuming that the layman is without the training necessary to the discharge of his duties, while the fact is that from infancy on every individual is exercising such intelligence as he has in separating the true from the false, in judging of the motives that actuate others, and in reaching conclusions in more or less doubtful situations. It is not uncommon, either, that one or more jurymen have acquired a familiarity with some line of activity that aids materially in resolving the question at issue. I have in mind, as illustrative, controversies common in Montana and the West generally over water rights, dependent largely upon conditions that existed in the pioneer days, of which no description can convey the intelligent comprehension enjoyed by a juryman who lived through them. It was doubtless due in some degree to the fact that they would be familiar with local conditions, a knowledge of which would be of aid in arriving at a just conclusion that the rule was early established that the jury should be of the vicinage.

It is evident from a perusal of many, if not most, of the articles which have been published by lawyers, usually in criticism of the jury as a part of the machinery of justice, that the writers entertain an ill-disguised contempt for the judgment of the general mass of citizens called to jury duty. Let me warn you against acquiring, through reverses or otherwise, any sympathy with that view. It will be fatal to your success in jury trials. Even little children instinctively, almost unerringly, discern whether affection exhibited or professed toward them is genuine or calculated and insincere. You will, accordingly, act wisely if you assume that the fault will have been yours, or that the evidence required the verdict, if the jury does not accept the view you have presented.

It may in some instances be justifiable and profitable to arouse the emotions of the jury, but my experience has convinced me that no mistake is ever made in relying on an honest appeal to reason in addressing that branch of the court. Beyond question no small part of the disfavor expressed in more recent years concerning the jury system originates in disappointment at verdicts rendered in negligence cases resulting in death or personal injury, the criticism, as a rule, emanating from lawyers representing great transportation and industrial corporations mulcted by judgments rendered thereon.

It must be borne in mind that, influential as they are in forming or molding public opinion, it often happens that culpability is fairly established by the evidence, while the popular view is that sympathy for the unfortunate victim of the accident alone accounts for the verdict. All manner of laws have been enacted to enforce the observance of precautions against avoidable risks. Even in the many instances in which in cases of that sort juries have been unduly sympathetic substantial justice has been done, as evidenced by modern statutes, abolishing the fellow servant rule, abrogating or modifying the rule of contributory negligence and of assumed risk, and even imposing a liability, as do workmen's compensation acts, regardless of negligence. Such cases are to be classed with those in which, in the cause of liberty, juries have flagrantly disregarded the instructions of judges intent upon carrying out the purposes of oppressive or tyrannical rulers.

Some of the criticisms leveled at the jury are met by constitutional provisions of relatively recent origin authorizing a verdict by less than the whole number, usually two-thirds or three-fourths. At least 17 States have sanctioned this innovation, including Montana, in which eight jurors concurring in civil causes or prosecutions for misdemeanors, a verdict is returned. But two combinations, 6 and 6 or 7 and 5, can result in a mistrial. Disagreements in that situation are rare. The departure after being in vogue since the State was admitted 40 years ago is universally approved by the bar and the public generally. The ancient rule still obtains, of course, in trials in the Federal court so that opportunity is afforded for judgment on the relative merit of the two systems by those familiar by experience with the operation of both.

The hesitancy exhibited by the States generally in inaugurating the change thus approved by many of them, leads to the conclusion that the amendment to the National Constitution necessary to its introduction as a feature of the Federal system is not to be expected, at least in the near future. The obstacles to its adoption in a number of the States may not be so serious. A provision such as is found in some State constitutions guaranteeing the right of trial by jury would, perhaps, be construed to extend to all cases in which the right existed at common law, in view of the adjudications that there is by such implied a jury of 12 and a unanimous verdict. But the guaranty is limited, in some States to criminal cases only from which it may reasonably be argued that the subject is open to regulation by the legislature in respect to civil cases.

But if one were forced to entertain doubts of the wisdom of the jury system as a feature of the administration of justice through the courts its value as a political institution must be recognized by all. One can not fail to appreciate the happy influence of calling regularly from the body of the citizenry a considerable number to aid in inforcing the criminal law, and to sit in judgment as between private litigants. If the juryman is called in a criminal case, he is adjured, on the one hand, to bear in mind how essential it is to the general peace and safety of the community, not to speak of its well-being, not only that there should be laws for the punishment of the evildoer, but that they should be rigidly inforced. The effect is indisputably to inculcate a respect for law and the general observance of it without which relapse into barbarism is unavoidable. Or, on the other hand, he is admonished that as he would dread for himself or those dear to him an unjust conviction of crime upon a charge originating in error or malice, so he should hesitate except upon clear proof to subject even the meanest to the penalty of the law however light or however grievous it may be. Can one imagine a more impressive lesson to be just? Equally important is the experience in being called upon to judge between two private litigants. But above all, perhaps, is the consideration that the people themselves are called upon to participate in the administration of the law which is the expression of their will.

In a jury trial the judge abdicates, if that is the proper word, the functions he usually exercises and they are devolved upon the 12 men in the box selected according to law directly from the body of the people, the judge acting as the head of the court and the legal adviser of the jury, but without power to control their decision, so that in a very just sense the cause, so far as the facts are concerned, is determined by them. It was no doubt because of its value in training for citizenship, as well as its serviceability as a check upon absolutism, that President Jefferson in his famous first inaugural address listed "trial by juries impartially selected" as "one of the essential principles of our Government." As a rule those entertaining the view of the unfitness of jurors as triers of questions of fact are equally confident of the unfitness of the people as a whole to the task of government—they distrust democracy in any of its manifestations.

De Tocqueville, the philosophical Frenchman who spent some time about the middle of the last century in America studying its people and its institutions, expressed the view that the jury system everywhere prevailing and the New England town meeting were the two paramount influences in the development of our genius for self-government. That genius was exhibited strikingly in the early days of my State, some of the dramatic incidents of which were featured in widely read magazine articles appearing within recent months. No organized government existed in the country when, toward the close of the Civil War, populous communities sprang up in consequence of the stampede occasioned by the discovery of gold. Along with the law-abiding, there flocked to the rich camps a horde of scoundrels, many of whom had fled to the desert and the wilderness to escape the just punishment to which their disorderly lives had subjected them, intent upon preying upon the enterprising, the industrious, and the thrifty. These effected a rude organization which dealt out swift and often tragic justice to the road agents and other contemners, only, however, after a trial that rarely if ever failed to develop the truth of the accusation.

In similar fashion, should a private controversy arise as, for instance, to the ownership of a mining claim, every man in the camp threw down his pick and shovel and repaired to the grocery store or some convenient saloon, heard the disputants, and such witnesses as were produced and then, by popular vote, passed judgment which prudence suggested be strictly and promptly observed.

I am by no means prepared to admit that questions of fact in actions at law would, on the whole, be resolved more in consequence with truth and the spirit of justice by a single judge or by a limited number of judges than by a jury, but its value is not to be appraised solely on that ground; it is an expression of the American ideal of government by the people. In a chapter of Democracy in America, devoted to the subject, the erudite author before referred to, in which he extols the jury as a judicial agency as well as a political institution, and ranks the value of its use in civil actions as higher even than in criminal cases, says:

"The jury contributes powerfully to form the judgment and to increase the natural intelligence of a people; and this, in my opinion, is its greatest advantage. It may be regarded as a gratuitous public school, ever open, in which every juror learns his rights, enters into daily communication with the most learned and enlightened members of the upper classes, and becomes practically acquainted with the laws, which are brought within the reach of his capacity by the efforts of the bar, the advice of the judge, and even by the passions of the parties. I think that the practical intelligence and political good sense of the Americans are mainly attributable to the long use which they have made of the jury in civil causes."

I am moved, accordingly, to admonish you to beware of falling into the cynicism you may hear expressed about the jury system, voiced probably without serious reflection or by some one whose views have taken color from what he conceives to be the interests of his clients or from his own failures.

It is my observation that most of those severely critical of the jury system never succeeded very well before juries due, no doubt, in some degree, as heretofore observed, to the fact that they lacked confidence in the capacity and intellectual integrity of the jury. But whatever one may think of that system, unguided by experience and uninfluenced by the ecomiums which have been lavished upon it, there can be no doubt that it will remain permanently, so far as can now be discerned, a part of our scheme of government. It would require an amendment of the Constitution of the United States to dislodge it from the place it occupies in our national economy; impossible, except upon the assent of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. It would necessitate like action by the various States to rid themselves of the system in so far as it obtains in their courts, though such action might be assumed on the part of the greater number should a Federal amendment be adopted. In this situation it behooves every tyro at the bar looking to any advanced position in his profession to cultivate the art of developing facts before and presenting them persuasively to a jury. Before they can be presented, except by cross-examination, painstaking investigation is necessary to determine what they really are, either by or under the direction of the lawyer responsible, a task making exacting demands on his intelligence, imagination, and ingenuity, often baffling, but rarely past discharging effectively. Being convinced of how the truth lay, I have seldom found myself balked in an effort to establish it to my own satisfaction, at least.

The statutes permitting a party to take the deposition of his antagonist and other witnesses in his confidence may often be effectively availed of. Conceiving on one occasion, without any proof whatever at hand, that a certain condition must have existed to bring about the situation of which my client complained, I served notice to take and took the depositions of officers of a corporation defendant, and from its books and records, which they were required to produce, so completely demonstrated the truth of the charge made that a satisfactory settlement promptly followed.

What is here said may be in the nature of repetition, but the admonition will bear repetition seeing that, as stated by Dean Pound, "nine-tenths of the problems of the practitioner are problems of fact and the ability of the lawyer is measured largely by his success in dealing with facts." It will likewise bear repetition that an essential condition of his attaining to excellence in that branch of his work is that he not only know the law applicable but that he be alive to its importance in the case before him. Deficiency in either particular limits the value of proficiency in the other. Consequently, there is every reason to improve the waiting period through which most lawyers must pass, by adding to the store of knowledge of the law acquired in your studies here, as well as enriching it by incursions into the field of history and general literature.

In conclusion, let me further admonish you to aim high. I have known of some dismal failures by men of superior talent who remained quite content to occupy some relatively inferior position in life, when, with no more than ordinary ambition and energy, they might have occupied stations of vastly greater influence and usefulness, to themselves and to the public. I welcome you to the profession which, in every age and in every country, among civilized men, has attracted the brightest minds, has provided so many great leaders of the people, and that has so abundantly served the cause of liberty.

TARIFF DUTY ON SUGAR

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a very interesting letter from Mr. John H. Kirby, president of the Southern Tariff Association, addressed to Mr. H. C. Lakin, president of the Cuba Co. of New York, in which he discusses the tariff on sugar in an extremely interesting and able manner. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. I should like to read just the concluding sentence, which says:

In closing let me say that I am for amply adequate protection for all agricultural products of every character and in every section. I believe the sugar producers of Louisiana are as patriotic, as deserving, and as important to the welfare of the Nation as any others; therefore it will please me to see them secure such tariff safeguards as I believe their circumstances require.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the Senator indorse that statement?

Mr. RANSDELL. I absolutely indorse it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the entire letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

SOUTHERN TARIFF ASSOCIATION,
Houston, Tex., June 15, 1929.

Mr. H. C. LAKIN,
President the Cuba Co., New York.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of May 31, inclosing an address written by you "To the Householders of the United States."

It recites the evils of the proposed increase in the tariff on sugar. But I fear you have looked upon this matter more from the viewpoint of those Americans interested in Cuban plantations than from either American consumers or American thinkers who wish to see every one of the productive possibilities of their country fully engaged.

You state that the higher duty proposed on this commodity will ruin our export business to Cuba. I fail to find any convincing fact to support such a contention; the policy of requiring the foreigner to pay a tax for the privilege of entering our markets with his goods never has had that effect. In this case retaliation would be less likely than in any other because Cuba owns less than 25 per cent of the sugar-producing properties involved.

The argument is made that the proposed increase will be a burden upon the people of the United States by raising the price of sugar to the consumer without giving any help to the domestic producer. I can not very well understand such reasoning, for if the price of the commodity is raised the returns of those who produce it will be increased.

Your most amazing statement, however, is that Louisiana cane growers are not prosperous "because from a strictly economic standpoint they ought not to be producing sugar." If the suggestion carried in this argument were to be followed with reference to a number of the principal endeavors of our country, the result would be appalling abandonment of American pursuits. Without safeguarding duties we can not successfully grow sugar in the United States. But without them we can not successfully grow wool and beef, two other vital requirements.

To take the position that we should remove tariff duties from any commodity of ours where a major portion of the same is produced abroad or where it may be produced more cheaply abroad is to advocate industrial disorganization and large unproductive regions in the United States. South America and Australia can drive us out of the wool business; Italy may render the growing of citrus fruits unprofitable; and other countries might take other markets from us. Such a policy would send us to Argentina for our beef, to Manchuria for our vegetable oils, to Spain for our grapes, and to Mexico for our tomatoes, onions, and beans.

You say from an economic standpoint we should not be producing sugar in Louisiana. I say from an economic standpoint we should be producing whatever we can wherever the soil and climate will permit. The Nation's imperial economic situation has been reached in this very way. Such a policy gives the greatest employment to our people and renders us more independent before the world. With the destruction of a tariff safeguard the article affected would undoubtedly be cheaper for a time. But there would be less for labor to do in our country, and a low market will not mean anything to us when we do not have anything with which to buy.

Louisiana has been producing sugar for more than a century. Thousands of acres of land in that State are not adapted to any other pursuit. These lands would be without value if we did not maintain tariff duties on sugar sufficiently adequate to make the growing of sugar cane upon them profitable. If tariff duties remain insufficient, it can only mean that in time the sugar industry will be destroyed in that State and in the United States. In such an event we would be at the mercy of a monopoly conducted by the importers and foreign growers and would be compelled to pay a higher price for our sugar than we now pay.

Statesmen of all sections and throughout the whole range of our history have asked for a duty on sugar for the benefit of Louisiana's sugar growers. They did not believe in letting the industry perish for the lack of nourishment; they said that without tariff safeguards it would be destroyed and the sugar plantations would go back into the gulf from which they had been a gradual conquest.

I am familiar with those sections in Louisiana where sugar is grown. I know thousands of men dependent to some extent upon this industry for their measure of comfort and prosperity, and they are not rich nor do they dwell in mansions like some of the American importers. The lands they use for this object constitute their principal possessions and are adapted only to the growing of sugar cane. I would not insist upon dissipating their hopes and rendering vain their efforts by calling for legislation which I know from experience will ruin them.

With duties below the protecting point, these descendants of the noble pioneers of Louisiana, who have been engaged in this pursuit all their lives, will be compelled to abandon their homes and seek employment elsewhere. The result may be cheaper sugar for a little while. But you admit in your address that sugar was beyond the reach of the average family in 1920, when there was a lower duty than now. The reason was that a few men controlled the market, and if a policy of nonprotection should be adopted it would destroy sugar production in our country and leave us more at the mercy of these speculators than we were at that time.

Some may think this impossible because we do not permit a monopoly to exist in our country. But if Louisiana should abandon the production of sugar, as you insist that she should, and if the other States similarly engaged should do likewise, the price would be set in a foreign country beyond the regulatory power of any law that this Government might enact.

I have traveled in Louisiana when her sugar producers had been left out in the cold by tariff makers. I have seen the mills closed with no price for cane and the people idle and unable to secure a fair share of the comforts of life. It is physically impossible for those great old southern people of that State, with respectable homes and a worthy civilization to maintain, to compete with half-clad Cubans who have no enlightenment nor respectable living standards.

My belief is that they are entitled to better treatment at our hands; that they should have the full benefits of an economic policy established at the beginning of the Government for the development and welfare of America. I can not agree with you that because only a fifth of the sugar we consume is produced at home we should impoverish those who are producing it. This would wrong them and leave our country in a less favorable economic situation.

The price of sugar is reasonable compared with some commodities like tea and coffee, which have been untaxed, and I think that justice and wisdom require that we give first consideration to these cane growers of Louisiana and beet growers of other sections, who are furnishing our country with this commodity, and erect for them, and maintain for them as a permanent policy of the Government, substantial barriers behind which they may work with a profit.

A portion of your argument is directed to the unfavorable sentiment which may be created against us if we levy a higher duty on Cuban sugar. You seem to think such action will destroy our trade with those people. But to whom would they turn? I think all the other principal nations of the earth are taxing their sugar equally as heavy as we propose to tax it. I do not have the latest figures in my possession, but it was only a few years ago that 11 nations exacted a higher duty on all sugar passing through their customhouses than we propose now to collect from Cuba.

Is it not likely that only a small portion of the sentiment unfavorable to us would exist in Cuba, as 75 per cent of the sugar-producing property of the island is owned in the United States?

You say that the increase in the duty provided for by the Hawley bill will cost our consumers $84,000,000 per annum or the full amount represented by the customhouse requirements of the new law. If that is true, and if the Americans simply tax themselves, leaving the Cubans free from the responsibility of paying any part of it, then upon what pretense, pray tell me, may they become our enemies and withhold their trade from us?

The statement is also made that in 1922 the cane growers of Louisiana appealed to Congress for a duty of 1.7648 cents per pound on Cuban sugar; that they thought this would keep that sugar out of our market. I do not think any such idea was entertained or that such a purpose was intended. The duty asked for was not to keep anybody's sugar out, but to enable the people who are raising sugar-cane here and sugar beets here to sell the same at a living price. As you have intimated, sugar is a vital product when we are at war, and we might some time be forced to war again. If such an evil should befall us, it would be better, I think, to have considerable sugar production at home than to be forced to depend on Cuba because of a situation brought about by a low tariff bill.

I have not gone into a discussion of the situation with reference to the sugar-beet industry. It is becoming potential and as a citizen of the United States I am proud of it. The plea that is made for safeguarding and saving the Louisiana cane growers applies as forcibly in the case of our western sugar-beet growers. Unless the tariff safeguards are adequate it will collapse and the troubles of agriculture be increased.

In closing let me say that I am for amply adequate protection for all agricultural products of every character and in every section. I believe the sugar producers of Louisiana are as patriotic, as deserving, and as important to the welfare of the Nation as any others, therefore it will please me to see them secure such tariff safeguards as I believe their circumstances require.

Yours very truly,

JNO. H. KIRBY.

THE FRENCH DEBT

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. HOWELL addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understood, it was the senior Senator from Nebraska who was recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the senior Senator from Nebraska. May the resolution be withheld a minute?

Mr. HOWELL. I beg pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the introduction of my colleague's resolution. I will speak on that if he will send it to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Nebraska submits a resolution which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 102) was read, as follows:

Whereas an indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies in the amount of $400,000,000 is due and payable on August 1, 1929; and

Whereas the payment of such indebtedness is provided for in the agreement (known as the Mellon-Berenger agreement) made on behalf of the United States by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and approved by the President, providing for the funding and payment of the entire indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States, which agreement, treating all payments by France as applied to interest, is equivalent (1) to the cancellation of such indebtedness and the accrued interest thereon as of June 15, 1925, totaling $4,230,777,000; and in addition (2) to the cancellation of all interest accruing on said indebtedness from and after June 15, 1925, except the equivalent of an annual payment for 62 years of approximately 2.17 per cent on said $4,230,777,000; and

Whereas such agreement specifically provides that it shall not become effective until ratified in France and until approved by the Congress; and

Whereas the ratification in France of such agreement, in accordance with the terms thereof, is now under consideration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the passage of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) authorizing the postponement of the date of maturity of the principal of the indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies, the Senate places upon it an interpretation in conformity with the terms of the preamble above set forth.

FARM RELIEF—THE DEBENTURE PLAN

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senate adjourns I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a press report which was sent out over the country by the United Press soon after we disposed of the so-called farm bill. I have learned from officials of the United Press Association that the quotations I am about to read are correct, and were sent to all the patrons of that news service. Inasmuch as this publication applies to every Member of the Senate who voted for the so-called debenture amendment to the farm bill, I think it ought to be called to the attention of the Senate.

I will read that part of the news item to which I feel exception ought to be taken and notice ought to be called. I am reading this from a daily paper published in McCook, Nebr. The article is under a Washington date line of June 12. In part, it reads as follows:

> Waterways, patronage, and local development projects have figured in the White House conferences of this senatorial group, and virtually every project in this category has involved some outlay by the Federal Treasury.

The first part of the article speaks of the Senators who were for the debenture plan, and what they were trying to do to the President.

> It is freely admitted by Hoover's supporters, both in and out of Congress, the President might have had the administration farm program as much as six weeks ago had he been willing to submit to political cudgeling on patronage and other matters for Senate votes. It is admitted by these same supporters to-day the President can have the farm bill any day he elects to make a few "timely" decisions affecting other projects in which a number of Senators are interested.
> President Hoover, however, has taken the position from the outset of the special session, which began April 15, that the farm program is an epochal piece of legislation which should be accepted or rejected on its merits. He has set his course firmly against "buying" from the Senate with political bargaining a measure to which no "practical objections" have been raised.

Mr. President, I assume that that has been published all over the United States in the afternoon papers of that date. There is no name attached to it. It is a United Press dispatch, and is so marked. I took it up with an official of the United Press here, and he admits that it is one of those dispatches, and expressed very great regret that it had been sent out over the country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did the Senator get any information as to the particular Senators whose votes could be secured if they obtained the appointments they desired?

Mr. NORRIS. No. I have read the part of the article which I think applies to the Senate as far as the farm bill is concerned. I have no other information.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But did the Senator prosecute his inquiries with the official of the press association to ascertain what Senators were referred to?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The particular official of the press association with whom I talked—the correspondent who represents this association at the Capitol, or one of them—did not know. He assumed that this dispatch came from the representative of this press association who covers the White House. I do not know his name.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. In that connection I should like to know if there is any intimation as to whether or not it came out of the medicine-ball cabinet?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NORRIS. I should be glad if Senators would let me proceed with my remarks, but I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I merely desire to make an inquiry. I suppose the eight or nine of us who remained steadfast to the last, and voted against the bill, are the only ones who did not get their reward. I take it that those who finally voted for the bill got their reward.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is not any use in my trying to tell the Senate what happened and what went on during the course of that long or reasonably long struggle here, carried on, I think, legitimately and fairly; and I am not criticizing any Senator as to his vote. It seems to me, however, that this dispatch sent out to the country is almost an insult, if not so, to every Member of the Senate who voted for the debenture amendment to the farm bill—a charge that these Senators, or at least a portion of them, were trying to hold up the President, and were willing to trade with the President if he would give them patronage or other favors, and vote for his farm bill as he wanted it and against the debenture amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment I will yield. I do not think it is any secret here that there was a great deal of pressure, as there usually is under those circumstances; but, as far as I observed it, it was all on the other side. It was presidential pressure. It was pressure coming from those who represent the administration; and, while I have not repeated it, there are several Senators in this body who voted for the debenture who told me of pressure that was brought to bear on them. I am not saying that it was wrong. In some instances it seems to me those things are not right, but they usually go on all the time. I will quote the words of one Senator, now in the Chamber, who voted for the debenture. He said to me that he had been "promised the world with a fence around it" if he would vote against the debenture.

I am not charging, and I do not want to be considered as charging, that the President himself said or did anything that was improper, or that any particular individual did, but there is no doubt whatever that there was pressure attempted, at least, against many Senators to have them vote the other way. I want to say, and I believe I am accurately informed on it, that any charge that these Senators who were behind the debenture amendment were guilty of any wrongful act or any preconcerted or prearranged plan to wring from the President or from any other public official, in trade for votes, any promise or anything, directly or indirectly, is positively false and without any foundation whatever.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I merely wanted to ask my distinguished friend from Nebraska whether he thought it was any worse to be accused of what he or those associated with him have been accused of in these newspaper stories than to be accused of the things of which he and those associated with him very frequently accuse me and those who think as I do on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I most certainly do think it is entirely different.

Mr. BINGHAM. Because the Senator gives more weight to a newspaper story than he does to what a Senator says on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. Not necessarily. That is not it at all. I do not know what the Senator is thinking about; but he can call my attention to any statement I have ever made in the Senate, and I will, at least from my viewpoint, differentiate it from this. But, if that were true, are we going to excuse this great newspaper organization, which covers and reaches every hamlet in the United States and in the world, for spreading this erroneous statement that charges Senators with an act that is not only disgraceful, but, if it were true, would be impeachable? You can not excuse them even if you think I do things, as the Senator from Connecticut intimates, along the same line, that are not right. That is no excuse.

Mr. President, here is a great newspaper association. It is one of the greatest in the world, as I have said. The people look upon it as being reliable. I know some of the men who are at the head of it. I have met them casually. I think they are honest, earnest men. As far as I know, those who control the association are trying to do justice and to give correct items of news. They are probably misled sometimes by enthusiastic employees.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. But here is a statement that is false, that is damaging, falsely intimating that Senators were disregarding their duty and offering to trade legislation for patronage.

I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. What I wanted to ask the Senator is whether this great newspaper organization is so helpless that it can not tell who it is that sends out news items under its name?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senate could get the information.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought they denied to the Senator that they knew who sent it out. Is there no responsible head?

Mr. NORRIS. The particular person with whom I talked said he did not know. If the Senate thinks enough about it to appoint a committee, I do not believe there will be any difficulty or trouble in finding out who wrote the article.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the importance of the incident, which has just been described by the Senator from Nebraska, is in the fact that it demonstrates the poisonous propaganda that is put out here by the press and press associations whenever there is exercised independence of judgment by men in this Chamber.

I am not quarreling, nor do I desire to quarrel, with the press or the press associations. But here, sir, is the United Press, which carries its tales to more evening papers in the United States, perhaps, than any other press association, save possibly one. It carries its stories from the city of Washington as stories of what actually may be transpiring.

Here we have a story, as the Senator from Nebraska has said, from the correspondent of the United Press at the White House, who sends abroad, into every hamlet in the land, and to every newspapers that subscribes to the United Press, a tale that the men who voted for the debenture are men who are bartering with the President of the United States, in substance, upon legislation, upon patronage, and the like, a story made out of whole cloth, known to be false when it was written, known to be false when the propaganda was instilled into this press association, and it is simply part and parcel of what daily is transpiring in the city of Washington, and part and parcel of the malicious, mendacious, and false stuff that is being paid out to the American people in every State in this Union concerning what happens in this city.

May I say for myself—and I think I can say for the Senator from Nebraska, and I think I can say for others who voted for the debenture plan—I have never asked patronage of the present administration, nor did I of the preceding administration. I am not interested in patronage of any kind or any character. Gentlemen on this side of the Chamber and many of those on the other side, who voted for the debenture plan, have a like view, in my opinion, concerning patronage, and when it was conveyed to the people of the land that we were voting in a certain way upon a measure here that was of prime importance to the farming communities of the United States, because we had not been able to wrest and wring, or, as the article said, cudgel from the President patronage for favorites, for legislative action, it was known when sent over the wire, it was known when the individual on the street gave the stuff out, to be absolutely and unqualifiedly false, and it was given out for the sole purpose of poisoning the American people, and endeavoring to injure and destroy those who were engaged in the activities here on this floor in behalf of the debenture plan.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I have absolute confidence in what the Senator says. I know that it is absolutely true. I was going to ask whether or not there is any Senator who favored the debenture plan who was approached by the administration, or anyone claiming to represent the administration, suggesting that he could get patronage if he would change his vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator would have to ask somebody else than myself concerning approaches of that sort.

Mr. JONES. The Senator, I knew, had not been approached.

Mr. JOHNSON. The incident is illustrative of what I spoke of during the speeches I made here, in such inadequate fashion, upon the debenture proposition; it is illustrative of the kind of propaganda that is poured forth in the Nation upon matters of this sort concerning Senators who perform their duties as Senators independently.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not get the same impression from the article read that seems to have been received by the Senator from Washington, namely, that the President had sought to secure aid against the debenture plan by a promise of patronage. As I understood the article, it was that certain Senators had gone to the President and had offered to vote against the debenture if they were accorded patronage.

Mr. JOHNSON. In substance, I think, may I say to the Senator from Montana, his statement is accurate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not intend to convey the idea that I had the impression the Senator said I did. My impression was received from the statement made by the Senator from California, and the question I asked was led up to by that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The accusation is obviously against some Members of this body, who, it is charged, were quite willing to vote against the debenture if the President would give them certain patronage which they solicited.

Mr. JOHNSON. That seems to be its effect, sir.

THE FRENCH DEBT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 102) relating to the French debt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution proposed by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

THE MISSISSIPPI FLOOD SITUATION

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement regarding Senate Resolution 69, relating to flood control, and ask for action upon it. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the resolution?

Mr. FRAZIER. Senate Resolution 69.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let it be reported.

Mr. FRAZIER. It provides for the appointment of a board of engineers to investigate the Mississippi flood-control question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, the joint resolution which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has in charge, and to take up for consideration Senate Resolution 69. A demand for the reading of the resolution having been made, the clerk will read it.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 69) submitted by Mr. FRAZIER May 16 (calendar day May 23), which is, entire, as follows:

Whereas the attempts of the United States Army Engineers for the last century to control floods in the Mississippi Valley have resulted in but one disastrous failure after another; and

Whereas with such a record, and with the following condemnatory report made by the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives upon the Jadwin plan before its adoption by the Seventieth Congress, it seems almost incredible that said Congress should have voted about $300,000,000 to be expended upon that plan; and

Whereas the following are verbatim quotations from the aforesaid report upon the Jadwin plan, which was submitted to the Seventieth Congress before it adopted said plan, by the Hon. FRANK R. REID, of Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Flood Control of the House of Representatives (to accompany H. R. 8219), March 29, 1928 (p. 16):

"ENGINEERING FALLACIES OF JADWIN PLAN

"(1) That it is lacking in engineering details and has not a sufficient factor of safety; (2) that it uses new and untried methods in the diversion of the flood waters; (3) that the 'fuse-plug' levees will not work and disaster will result; and (4) generally that it is not dependable and is not feasible from an engineering standpoint. The committee did not believe it probable that so many eminent engineers could all be wrong and therefore refused to adopt the Jadwin plan as the project for the flood-control work.

"Instead of the Jadwin plan, if adopted by Congress, providing protection from the floods for the lower Mississippi Valley, it might result in the recurrence of a disaster like that of 1927."

Whereas, notwithstanding the above report from the only committee in Congress devoted exclusively to flood control, its advice was not accepted by the Seventieth Congress, and a bill was rushed through the Senate practically without debate, which, after material change in conference, on May 15, 1928, was approved by the President; and

Whereas it seems to be the unanimous opinion of engineers in the United States (except General Jadwin and some other Army engineers) that the adopted Jadwin plan is an engineering disgrace, which, if carried out, will involve enormous initial cost; make more than 6,000,000 acres of land practically worthless, even if the Jadwin plan should meet his most sanguine representation; entail perpetual expense; bring catastrophe unprecedented; and perpetuate in a monument of mud 1,000 miles long the greatest mechanical monstrosity ever authorized by the government of a nation; and

Whereas after the perpetual failure of the Army engineers to control floods in the Mississippi River, after the report of the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives aforesaid, and after the manner in which the civilian engineers of the country were excluded from participation in determining the plan for flood control to be pursued, it is the opinion of many Senators that a board of disinterested civilian engineers of great attainments and experience should be called to express an opinion upon the adopted Jadwin plan, and, provided their decision is unfavorable, to determine upon some other plan, which in their judgment shall be better, and submit such plan to the Senate; and

Whereas at least one of the projects that the proposed board would be expected to consider is the Riker Mississippi spillway project, which vitally concerns the three Senate committees whose chairmen are to appoint the board—the chairman of the Committee on Commerce because his committee specifically represents the subject of flood control, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee because his committee specifically represents the subject of interstate commerce, in which it will create a revolution, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, because it will greatly reduce transportation costs, both foreign and domestic, in which his committee is vitally interested, all of which subjects would be beneficially affected by the Riker project should it be adopted; and

Whereas although the employment of the proposed Senate Mississippi Engineering Advisory Board will undoubtedly necessitate a considerable expense, such a board is recommended by 20,000 engineers, and among them many of the foremost, who specifically state that the vital importance of the subject would more than justify it; and many Senators have even more forcibly expressed themselves in recommending it; and

Whereas should there be a disposition upon the part of the Senate to economize by refusing the needed appropriation, it should be borne in mind that when the Riker Mississippi Spillway project was presented for hearing before the Commerce Committee of the Senate Mr. Riker proposed that the Senate should bear the expense of a model of his project ($6,000), to which Senator JONES demurred, and that then Mr. Riker, being so sure of his ground, expended upward of $10,000 of his own money in its construction, and this model is now operating in the basement of the Senate Office Building, illustrating the Riker Mississippi Spillway project; and

Whereas it should also be borne in mind that a report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army in 1888 showed that Mr. Riker saved this Government nearly $1,000,000 in the filling of the mud flats, making what is now known as Hains Point, the fashionable speedway of the Nation's Capital, and figuring the amount saved to be but one-half this sum, with the interest at 5 per cent compounded, the amount would now represent à total saving to the United States Government of more than $4,000,000: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That there is hereby established a board to be known as the Senate Mississippi Engineering Advisory Board, which shall be appointed, acting jointly, by the chairmen of the Committees on Commerce, Interstate Commerce, and Agriculture and Forestry; said chairmen shall have the authority to fix the compensation of the members of said board and to remove or replace at any time a member thereof. The said board shall submit a report to each of the said committees, and each committee shall transmit to the Senate the said report with their findings thereon.

The said board shall be composed of 11 members who shall be nominated as follows: 1, a financial economist, by the President of the Senate; 2 Army engineers by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce; 2 civilian engineers by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce; 2 civilian engineers by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; 2 civilian engineers by the American Society of Civil Engineers; and 2 civilian engineers by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers.

The 11 members shall be qualified as follows: 1 member shall be an expert financial economist; 2 shall be Army engineers; and 8, each of whom shall be a distinguished civilian engineer of great attainment and experience, to be selected from as many of the following engineering classifications as practicable: Civil, mechanical, electrical, contracting, structural concrete, foundation, locks, dams, dredging, hydraulic, or marine construction.

The board shall elect its own chairman, and select and determine upon the compensation of its employees, and it is authorized to summon before it such witnesses as it may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the board (1) to investigate the feasibility of the Jadwin plan adopted by the Seventieth Congress and such other plans for the control and utilization of the Mississippi River, and such ramifications relating thereto, as it shall deem advisable, specifically deep-water navigation from the Gulf to Cairo; and (2) to determine upon the best comprehensive project or projects for the control and utilization of the Mississippi River and such ramifications. The report of the board shall include the results of its investigations under this resolution, together with a statement of the estimated cost of, and the probable benefits and revenue to be derived from, the project or projects so determined upon, and recommended by the board, and the estimated time required for the construction of such project or projects. The first hearing of the board shall be held as soon as possible after the approval of this resolution.

SEC. 3. The expenses of the board in carrying out the purpose of this resolution, which shall not exceed $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairmen of the aforesaid committees.

The reading was interrupted by—

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, what is the use of having the resolution read? The consideration of the subject matter, I understand, is to be objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection has yet been made, but the Chair is informed that the resolution having already been referred to the Committee on Commerce, the proper motion should be to discharge the Committee on Commerce from further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is here, and, withholding the right to object, I should like to ask the chairman of that committee whether the committee has given any attention to this resolution, or had hearings on it. It seems to me a very important matter to take up and act upon at this late hour in to-day's session.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, because there was an appropriation carried in it. The chairman of that committee informed me to-day that it was impossible to get a quorum of the committee to consider it, and I am willing to strike out the appropriation, and was about to move to discharge the committee and ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution. I would like to make a brief statement about it.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. I again renew my inquiry of the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, which has such matters as this in charge, whether this resolution has been before his committee.

Mr. JONES. I do not remember it. It has not been called up before the committee. It has not been considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the clerk that the resolution was not referred to the Committee on Commerce, but was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Therefore the proper motion would be to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the resolution, whereupon, if the motion is carried, the Senator from North Dakota may move to amend the resolution by striking out the appropriation feature and then ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, to whose committee such matters as this are usually referred, whether or not the substance of this resolution is such that the resolution should have been referred to his committee first, before being referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. JONES. My belief is that all resolutions of this character ought to be referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter first, and then, after that committee has acted, if the action be favorable, they should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So far as the Chair may state the parliamentary situation with reference to the resolution, it is this: The Senator introducing it made a request, one almost without exception observed, namely, that the resolution should be referred to a certain committee, to wit, in this instance, the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and the resolution was so referred. It having been so referred and not having been acted upon by that committee it is entirely in order for the Senator from North Dakota now to move to discharge the committee; but, upon objection, that motion must go over for a day.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FRAZIER. I yield.

OIL AND GAS LANDS

Mr. KING. I apologize to the Senator, but I will be very glad if he will yield to me for a few moments.

Several weeks ago I desired to address the Senate upon a resolution which I offered and which is now before the Committee on the Judiciary, dealing with the order of the President and the Secretary of the Interior with respect to oil conservation.

Mr. President, on the 18th day of April, 1929, I offered a resolution which is pending before the Judiciary Committee dealing with the action of the President and the Secretary of the Interior in making inoperative the leasing act of 1920. I had intended to speak upon the resolution and the so-called oil-conservation policy of the President and the Secretary of the Interior, but at the request of the leader upon the other side of the aisle I refrained from doing so when the farm bill was under consideration as I did not desire to delay its passage, and also did not desire to take the time of the Senate to present my views upon this important question when the reapportionment bill was being considered. It had been my intention to address the Senate to-day upon the subject, but important measures that have engaged our attention have prevented me from doing so. In view of the lateness of the hour I shall not trespass upon the time of the Senate, but hope when the Senate reconvenes in August to address it upon the resolution which I have offered and which is, as I stated, now before the committee.

At this time I shall content myself by asking permission to insert in the RECORD a number of statements and documents. First I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the resolution (S. Res. 17) to which I have referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 17) submitted by Mr. KING April 18, 1929, is as follows:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States conferred upon Congress the sole power and authority to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and

Whereas under this authority Congress, soon after the formation of the Government, adopted a policy, which has been uniformly followed, for the sale or other disposition of the public lands to its citizens, thus encouraging the settlement, cultivation, and development of the same; and

Whereas pursuant to such policy the law of May 10, 1866, was enacted by Congress under the terms of which all mineral lands on the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, were made open to exploration, occupancy, and purchase by the citizens of the United States, or those who declared their intention to become such; and

Whereas under the operation of the homestead, preemption, and mineral laws of the United States the Nation rapidly advanced in population, wealth, and mineral development, thereby justifying the said policy of encouraging private ownership of the public domain; and

Whereas under said policy and laws oil and gas were discovered within said domain and located by prospectors, and were developed through their energy and enterprise, involving great expense and hazards, and the profits arising therefrom were employed in the channels of commerce and industry; and

Whereas under the administration of President Taft in 1909, because of the apprehension that the oil and gas reserves of the Nation were being exhausted, the unoccupied public domain, containing oil and gas, was reserved from further prospecting and location until Congress should otherwise provide; and

Whereas during a number of years following the administration of President Taft Congress considered various measures providing for the development of oil, gas, and certain other mineral lands, under a system of public leases instead of location and sale as theretofore, and on February 25, 1920, passed an act entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain," which said act declared that said deposits shall be subject to disposition, in the form and manner provided by said act, to citizens of the United States or associations of such persons, or corporations organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory, subject to the right of the United States to extract helium from all gas produced from such lands, and further providing details under which such rights so granted should be exercised; and

Whereas said leasing act became immediately effective and was duly and continuously administered in full accord with its terms and requirements by the administrations of Presidents Wilson, Harding, and Coolidge, under whose administrations many leases and nearly 40,000 prospecting permits upon oil and gas lands were granted to citizens and corporations applying and endowed by the said act with the vested right to apply for and to be granted the same, whenever, upon investigation thereof, they were found entitled thereto; that in prospecting upon said lands millions of dollars were expended by such permittees and their assigns, and many applications for other permits were filed and were undisposed of at the close of the said Coolidge administration; and

Whereas on the 12th day of March last the President announced to representatives of the press that "there will be no leases for disposal of Government-owned oil lands, no matter what category they might lie in of Government holdings or Government control except those which may be mandatory by Congress. In other words, there will be complete conservation of Government oil in this administration"; and

Whereas said statement was immediately followed by departmental announcement of rules and regulations by the Secretary of the Interior designed to enforce said statement, under which department officials and agents are forbidden to accept or file any further applications for permits under said leasing act, while many of the permits granted have been and are being canceled, thus arresting the future operation of the said act and denying to citizens of the United States their right to apply for and secure permits and leases under the same. This procedure has summarily terminated the historic policy of the Government so far as it relates to oil and gas within the public domain, and will thus prevent the development of the same, and will deprive the United States and the States, respectively, of revenue and other benefits which they are now receiving and to which they are entitled under said leasing act; and

Whereas the total oil production from the public-domain States has been and is about 3 per cent of the Nation's total production, and will probably never exceed such percentage under the scale of development heretofore prevailing, while the gas production from said lands is unequal to the existing local demand for consumption, which demand is steadily increasing, so that the adoption of said alleged policy of conservation of said minerals will yield but negligible results, and by many is regarded as unjust to the people of said public-land States; and

Whereas the said leasing act in terms clothes all citizens of the United States with the right to apply for and receive permits to explore the public oil and gas lands and to obtain leases for the same upon discovery of oil or gas therein (which rights were conferred upon them in place of the rights of location, entry, and purchase thereof); that it is claimed that they can not be deprived of said rights except by congressional repeal of said act and with due regard to all rights acquired thereunder: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is hereby directed to make full and complete inquiry and investigation as to the power and authority of the President to modify, suspend, or set aside said leasing act, or any act of Congress, by Executive statement or otherwise, or to deny to citizens of the United States the exercise of any rights granted them by said leasing act; and also to inquire into the power and authority of the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate or enforce orders, rules, or regulations designed to carry out said policy of the President announced on the 12th day of March, A. D. 1929, or to promulgate or enforce any orders, rules, or regulations to modify, suspend, or set aside the said leasing act, or to deny to citizens of the United States the exercise of any right or rights granted to them by the said leasing act or by existing acts of Congress; and said committee is also directed to make such further inquiries and investigations concerning the subject matter of this resolution as, in their opinion, is essential or desirable for a complete understanding and report thereon, and to make full report to the Senate, together with its findings and conclusions in respect to such matters.

SEC. 2. Said committee is authorized to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, to employ such clerical assistance as is necessary, to sit during any recess of the Senate, and at such places as it may deem advisable. Any subcommittee duly authorized thereto shall have the powers conferred upon the committee by this resolution.

SEC. 3. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. KING. It has been claimed that the production of oil from the public lands of the United States contributed materially to the so-called overproduction. There is no justification for this contention. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Interior showing the production of oil in the public-land States. I might add that the entire production for 1928 from the public lands and privately owned lands amounts to 900,000,000 barrels.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 28, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KING: Your oral request of May 23, 1929, to the Geological Survey for information on petroleum produced from public lands under the act of February 25, 1920, is answered in the figures given below. Permit me to point out that these figures do not include the rather large production from Indian lands. It is evident that most of the oil lands have passed out of the control of the Government, although such reserves as there are seem to be in the public domain and on Indian lands. The need of adequate conservation measures for the handling of the oil still in the public domain is evident since the future of our country may well depend upon a national defense based upon gasoline.

1. Summary by calendar years since 1920, showing the total quantity of petroleum produced in the United States, the total quantity produced from public lands, and the percentage obtained from public lands:

Petroleum produced in the United States, January 1, 1920, to March 31, 1929, inclusive

Copies of the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Annual Reports of the Gological Survey, containing statistics of petroleum, natural gas, and natural-gas gasoline production from public lands and naval petroleum reserves, by fiscal years 1920 to 1928, inclusive, were sent you May 23, 1929.

Very truly yours,

RAY LYMAN WILBUR.

Mr. KING. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter addressed to the President signed by the Governors of Colorado, Utah, and Wyoming, together with a statement appearing in the Rocky Mountain News of April 3, 1929, showing some of the effects of the order issued by the President and the subsequent orders of the Secretary of the Interior; also a statement of the Attorney General in which he answered the request for his opinion as to the right of certain oil companies to enter into an agreement to restrict production; also a letter from Mr. H. Leslie Parker, of Denver, addressed to the attorney general of Wyoming, in which he discusses some of the legal questions involved in the order of the President and the Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

The documents referred to are as follows:

MOUNTAIN STATES GOVERNORS PUT OIL VIEWS BEFORE HOOVER—EXECUTIVES ASK PRESIDENT FOR PERSONAL TALK—LETTER SENT NATION'S CHIEF SAYS NO OVERPRODUCTION EXISTS IN REGION

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Governors of the States of Colorado, Utah, and Wyoming assembled in Denver, Colo., on March 30, 1929, for the purpose of discussing the situation created by the announced policies of the President relating to exploration of the public lands for the production of oil.

The Governor of Montana wished to attend the conference but was unable to arrange his plans to meet at the time selected.

The Governor of New Mexico advised us that he was satisfied with the announced policies of the administration and was not interested in attendance at the conference. These five public-land States are those most interested in the oil resources of the Rocky Mountain area.

SEEK EARNESTLY TO AID

Following a thorough discussion of the entire subject, the three governors attending the conference now very respectfully, but in great earnestness, urge upon you, as President of the United States, that much good can come through whole-hearted cooperation between the several States and the United States in the formulation of any policies concerning the public lands.

We feel the changes of policy, or proposed new policies, vitally affecting the welfare of the individual States, should not be made without conference and consultation with those charged with the duty of protecting and advancing the interests of their people.

We have an earnest desire to be helpful and will gladly give our aid to any policy that may be soundly based upon the good of the Nation, if the benefits conferred outweigh any detrimental effect upon the States concerned.

Upon the other hand, we believe we will be justified in expressing opposition to a policy that would seem to cause material injury to our States without adequately contributing to the solution of a national problem.

In approaching the problem of the conservation of the oil resources of the Nation we have carefully reviewed the facts, and we have come to the definite conclusion that the new policies, as applied to the public lands under order No. 338 of the Secretary of the Interior, will have little or no effect upon the problem of conservation or overproduction, but will have a disastrous effect upon the development and progress of the oil-producing public-land States.

NO OVERPRODUCTION

That the principal reasons for these conclusions upon our part may be presented to you, we are pleased to submit for your consideration the following information which seems to us authentic and pertinent to the subject:

1. There is no overproduction of oil in the Rocky Mountain States.

(a) Ready market in area naturally supplied by these States is found for all production.

(b) Trend in production is downward, and amount of crude oil produced to-day is only about one-half that of five years ago.

(c) Total production from these States is less than 3 per cent of total production of Nation.

(d) Present established refineries in area are running at only about one-half capacity.

(e) Policy of shut-in production followed whenever necessary.

2. There is no waste of oil in the Rocky Mountain States.

(a) Supply no more than sufficient to meet demand.

(b) Salt Creek field, producing about one-half of total production of area, is an outstanding example of fields efficiently operated under methods providing real conservation. Other fields of area largely follow example.

(c) Discoveries of future, even under most liberal policies, would only very gradually increase amount production, and would probably not compensate rate of depletion of existing fields.

SERIOUSLY AFFECTS STATES

3. The interest of the Rocky Mountain States will be seriously affected.

(a) Development of petroleum resources is now a major industry of this area, and vigorous enforcement of all features of order No. 338 will result in a serious decrease in the commerce and industry of the States.

(b) Time and labor of thousands of men and millions in investments will be seriously depreciated in value by strict enforcement of said order.

(c) Eventual result of enforcement of announced policies will be material reduction in revenues accruing to States for purposes of maintaining schools, building highways, developing reclamation projects, and contributing to other constructive undertakings.

(d) The development of oil in State and privately owned lands will be seriously handicapped as, without control of Government lands which usually surround such lands, operators could seldom afford to take the hazard of prospecting.

(e) The leasing act of 1920 recognized a partnership between the States and the United States and resulted from a compromise of conflicting interests. The States were granted a direct interest in revenues from development, in lieu of taxes that otherwise would have accrued to the States. Refusal to grant any new permits would have the effect of materially reducing revenues accruing to the States under the provisions of the said act, which in itself represented an endeavor to remedy the situation created to the prejudice of the public-land States by the withdrawal of certain public lands from entry and development.

URGE MODIFICATIONS

We are inclined to the belief that the announced policies were formulated as a result of the President's desire to see inaugurated a constructive program for the real conservation of the oil resources of the Nation, with the Government taking the lead so far as its direct control extends. To such a general program we readily subscribe.

We sincerely believe, however, that certain modifications of the announced policies would produce more favorable results than otherwise would be accomplished, and at the same time the interests of the oil-producing public-land States would be better served. The following suggestions come to mind at this time:

1. In lieu of requirement of strict compliance in all cases with terms of permits as to actual development, reasonable consideration be given to a policy of moratoriums for drilling operations when conservation would seem to be effected by such procedure.

2. Recognition of equities that may have been established, both in applications for permits and in existing permits, through expenditures of money and effort in geologising structures, reconciling conflicting interests, and otherwise providing a situation affording sound basis for development.

3. Consideration of equities of permittees as to preference right to lease remaining area covered by a permit, in addition to the 25 per cent of the area subject to mandatory lease. In many cases permittees have proceeded under feeling of assurance that, after a discovery, they would be able to exercise their option to lease all of area covered by permit.

ASK CONFERENCE

To the end that you may feel assured of our desire to be helpful, and in order that we may aid in bringing about better mutual understanding of the present situation in regard to the oil problem, we would welcome an opportunity for a frank personal discussion with you of this subject, so vital to State and Nation.

Very respectfully yours,

(Signed) WILLIAM H. ADAMS,
Governor of Colorado.

(Signed) GEORGE H. DERN,
Governor of Utah.

(Signed) FRANK C. EMERSON,
Governor of Wyoming.

LAND OFFICE HANDLES 1,000 CASES IN DAY

By George Sanford Holmes

WASHINGTON, April 2.—Despite the protests coming in from Western States against the new oil policy, the General Land Office proceeded serenely to-day with its task of rejecting applications and canceling prospecting permits.

Important figures of the oil industry meanwhile were gathering in Washington for a meeting to-morrow with the Federal Oil Conservation Board to discuss curtailments of production.

Approximately 1,000 cases were disposed of yesterday alone, which represented the peak of one-day volume in clearing the files of applications and permits coming under the presidential ban.

FIVE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-THREE PERMITS CANCELED

Although the land office has not yet had time to segregate yesterday's grist by classifications, the speed with which the office is working in killing applications and permits is shown by the records of cases handled between March 12, the date the new policy went into effect, and the close of business March 30.

In that time 2,137 cases were handled. The department canceled 523 prospecting permits, rejected 1,225 applications for permits, and wrote letters to 389 permittees, asking them to show cause why their permits should not be canceled.

Together with the number disposed of yesterday, this makes a grand total to date of more than 3,000 applications and permits weeded out by the board reviewing every one of the 20,000 outstanding oil prospecting permits.

WAIT TEXAS CO. REPORT

Meanwhile, members of the oil industry and holders of permits under group development are awaiting the report on the application of the Texas Oil Co. for time extensions, which is ready, it is understood, for submission to Secretary of the Interior Wilbur for approval. A report will be made this week, it is believed, establishing the status of a large number of similar claims.

E. B. Reeser, president of the American Petroleum Institute, and heads of regional committees are expected to attend to-morrow's meeting with the Oil Conservation Board.

ATTORNEY GENERAL HELPS

Secretary Wilbur has been furnished by Attorney General Mitchell with opinions sought regarding the oil board's powers and legality of the American Petroleum Institute's plans for curbing production, but will not make them public until to-morrow's meeting.

It was learned Wilbur recently gave audience to several attorneys and representatives of the oil industry, who asked that the department rule favorably upon the following points expressing the contentions of the oil industry:

That group development be recognized; that applications for prospecting permits filed prior to the new policy be permitted to go through; that B leases, so called, involving preferential selections of land up to the legal limit, be authorized as before in granting leases; that petitions for extension of time be granted in all cases in which compliance with requirements is shown or bona fide attempts to comply proved; and that the ruling that drilling must proceed on each permit be abrogated.

Ex-Senator Thomas, in a public letter to the local press, criticized the administration for announcing a policy that if the people do not like the situation they can appeal to the courts, and reiterating that the new policy sets aside the law and injures the Western States.

AUTHORITY TO APPROVE LIMIT ON OUTPUT OF OIL TERMED LACKING—ATTORNEY GENERAL RULES THAT FEDERAL CONSERVATION BOARD WAS CREATED MERELY FOR INVESTIGATION

The Federal Oil Conservation Board was created to investigate and study methods of the conservation of petroleum resources, and it was not the intention that its action "in approving or disapproving any plan for that purpose would have any legal effect on the validity of the plan proposed."

That is the substance of an opinion of the Attorney General, William D. Mitchell, given to the Secretary of the Interior, Ray Lyman Wilbur, in reply to the latter's inquiry as to the authority of the board to sanction the proposed plan of the American Petroleum Institute to limit the 1929 oil output to the figures of the 1928 production.

ANTITRUST PHASE DISCUSSED

Secretary Wilbur also asked whether the proposal was in violation of the antitrust laws, and in this connection the Attorney General said:

"As the powers of the board are limited in this way, the question of whether the proposed amendment would violate the antitrust laws is apparently not a question arising in one of the executive departments on which the Attorney General is authorized by law to give an opinion. Furthermore, it is not the practice of Attorneys General to give opinions as to whether proposed action by private persons would violate the laws of the United States."

QUESTIONS ARE SUBMITTED

The full text of tne Attorney General's opinion in the form of a letter in answer to inquiry by Mr. Wilbur, as chairman of the Federal Oil Conservation Board, follows:

Hon. RAY LYMAN WILBUR,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SECRETARY: I have the letter of March 20 written by you as chairman of the Federal Oil Conservation Board inclosing a copy of a resolution adopted by a committee of the American Petroleum Institute at Houston, Tex., on March 16, 1929, proposing that those engaged in the production of petroleum agree to limit production in certain areas in 1929 to the amount produced in 1928, provided that such action be first approved by the Federal Oil Conservation Board and by the authorities in the States affected.

The questions you submit for my opinion are whether the Federal Oil Conservation Board has power to approve the proposed agreement and what, if any, effect such approval might have in relieving the parties to the proposed agreement from the operation of acts of Congress forbidding agreements in restraint of interstate commerce. You also inquire whether the proposed agreement would violate the antitrust laws of the United States.

NO ACT DEFINING DUTIES

The Federal Oil Conservation Board was constituted December 19, 1924, by an Executive order naming the Secretaries of War, Navy, Interior, and Commerce. There was no act of Congress then in force defining the duties or powers of the board and there has been no legislation since dealing with the board, excepting appropriation acts, commencing with the acts of January 20, 1925, appropriating funds for the expenses of the board.

It is clear that Congress has not given the board any power to grant to any persons immunity from the operation of acts of Congress prohibiting agreements in restraint of interstate commerce and that the board has no authority to approve any action which is contrary to an act of Congress or to the antitrust laws of any State; and that no action taken by the board would have the effect of relieving parties to such an agreement from the operation of the antitrust laws of the United States and of the States. The proceedings of the American Petroleum Institute indicate that the purpose of submitting the proposed agreement to the Federal Oil Conservation Board for approval is to obtain a sanction from the Federal Government which may operate to make the parties to the agreement immune from the operation of the antitrust laws. For the Federal Conservation Board to grant approval under such circumstances would be assuming authority which it does not have.

AUTHORITY TERMED LACKING

The board's only duties are to investigate and study for the purpose of recommending methods of conservation and not with the intent that its action in approving or disapproving any plan would have any legal effect on the validity of the plan proposed. As the powers of the board are limited in this way, the question whether the proposed agreement would violate the antitrust laws of the United States is apparently not a question arising in one of the executive departments on which the Attorney General is authorized by law to give an opinion. Furthermore, it is not the practice of Attorneys General to give opinions as to whether proposed action by private persons would violate the laws of the United States.

The proceedings of the Petroleum Institute make it clear that its members already realize that under existing laws such an agreement could not safely be made without the sanction of some officials of the United States authorized to give it, and, as I have already pointed out, no such authority exists.

WILLIAM D. MITCHELL,
Attorney General.

DENVER, April 25, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM O. WILSON,
Office of the Attorney General, Cheyenne, Wyo.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Pursuant to a conversation you recently had with Mr. George Wheeler, regarding the alleged enforcible equities of the State of Wyoming as such, in the oil and gas deposits, and all revenues therefrom within the confines of the State boundaries as provided for under what is popularly known as the leasing bill (41 Stat. 437), I beg to address to you a few observations I have made in that regard.

It seems to be well settled that a State may not properly take up the burden of an individual citizen and for him assert his rights against other parties. However, the State of Wyoming may arrive at the same end and, indirectly, lift the burden of its individual citizens who are applicants for permits under the leasing bill, because the State, in asserting its own rights, may properly have the United States and its agents or officers enjoined from interfering with laws pertaining to the public domain within the State's confines. Let us review the fact, which we will find to be as follows:

First, let us examine the title of the leasing bill itself, which is as follows:

"An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain."

Our first comment, therefore, is to note that the purpose of the leasing act was to promote the development of the oil and gas deposits and not to "restrict" such development.

Second, The enacting clause is as follows, and, for brevity's sake, unrelated verbiage is deleted:

"Be it enacted, etc., That deposits of oil or gas, and lands containing such deposits owned by the United States, * * * shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided for by this act to citizens of the United States * * *."

It will be noted from the above clause that the oil and gas deposits on the public domain "shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by" the act, which act further provides as follows:

"SEC. 35. That, * * * 37½ per cent of the amounts derived from such bonuses, royalties, and rentals shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct"; and further we find:

"SEC. 32. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the rights of the States * * * to exercise any rights which they may have * * *."

Is it not a sound deduction that the provision of section 35 is in effect an absolute grant by the United States, as grantor, to the State of Wyoming, as grantee, of 37½ per cent of all revenues received by the United States of all royalties, bonuses, and rentals from lands within the State; or, in other words, is not section 35 a declaration of trust by the United States, as trustee, that it will pay 37½ per cent of all amounts it receives from oil and gas produced within such State to the State as beneficiary, and that any attempt by the agents of the United States to interfere with the free and untrammeled right of the State of Wyoming to receive such royalties, past, present, and future, any infringement or trespass upon those rights is a breach of the declared express trust, and that such hindrances, and those agents causing such hindrances, may be enjoined from so doing?

That eminent jurist, Joseph H. Choate, has argued that the United States, and each of the separate States, may sustain the character of trustee, and have the legal capacities to take and execute trusts for every purpose. See also Perry, Trusts, section 41; McDonogh v. Murdock (15 How. 400, 14 L. ed. 746); U. S. v. Michigan (190 U. S. 379, 41 L. ed. 1103); Van Wyck v. Kuevals (106 U. S. 360, 27 L. ed. 201).

It is well grounded that the United States holds the public domain in trust for those who may qualify to receive the same or the benefits of the same. See Dahl v. Raunheim (132 U. S. 260); Deffebach v. Hawke (115 U. S. 392); Gillis v. Downey (85 Fed. 483); Reins v. Raunheim (28 L. D. 526); Roe v. Stephenson (15 L. D. 37).

Perry on Trusts, fourth edition, section 95, says:

"A settler or a founder of a trust by grant, by his own act, becomes a stranger to the trust, in the sense that he no longer has an interest in the property he has alienated. It is true that the founder has a right of visitation, which he may retain or assign; but the court of chancery has nothing to do with his visitorial power. It is only as respects the administration of the corporate property that the court has any jurisdiction."

Therefore, from the above, it would appear expedient to determine whether or not the Secretary of the Interior has any judgment to be asserted, or, in other words, any discretionary power to do anything and everything he may see fit in his administration of the oil-land leasing bill. Even if it is conceded that, to some extent and that extent only applicable to individual applications for permits or permits or leases after issuance, each individual circumstance standing on its own merits, those merits being as to whether or not the individual applicant, permittee, or lessee has done all that is required of him by law, the Secretary has discretionary power, that power ceases with the individual circumstance and patently can not appiy to a blanket refusal to accept present and future applications and to cancel applications already filed because nowhere can such intent be found in the language of the leasing bill.

Assuming that the State of Wyoming is the owner of 37½ per cent of all revenues derived and to be derived from all oil and gas produced, saved, and sold from the public domain within the State of Wyoming, because of the grant contained in section 35 of the leasing bill, or assuming that the State of Wyoming is declared to be the beneficiary of the so-called declaration of trust by the United States contained in section 35, then there must be some adequate way by which such rights may be enjoyed and the free, unrestricted, and untrammeled use and benefit of such rights may be enforced in the courts of law as now constituted within the United States.

It may be apropos at this point to quote the Supreme Court of the United States in a case where the United States sued the State of Michigan (190 U. S. 379, 47 L. ed. 1103) as trustee for all revenues received by the State of Michigan from the sale of 750,000 acres of land granted by the United States to the State of Michigan to build the St. Marys Canal and wherein the court refers to the transaction as follows:

"But if the original transaction amounted to a trust, as we think it did, the attempt of the State to impose a condition upon its payment of the moneys and the transfer of the tools did not take away its liability as trustee, nor make it necessary that the United States should build the dry dock before it should be entitled to the money and the tools * * *. There was nothing in this legislation, in our opinion, which changed the character in which the State had acted as trustee * * *. We are of the opinion that the bill shows cause of action against the State of Michigan as trustee * * *."

I think all will agree, without question, that the State of Wyoming could properly go into the courts of the District of Columbia and enjoin the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office from interfering with the free and untrammeled operation of its rights under the leasing bill, which, of necessity, would enjoin the Government officers: From refusing to receive applications for permits; from canceling applications for same already filed; from refusing to issue what is known as "B leases" on acreage over and above what is known as preferential acreage contained in "A leases." But this procedure is long and tedious because of the appeals to the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and appeal from that court to the Supreme Court. The dockets of these courts are a long way behind on their current calendar.

Because of the importance of the matter to the public-land States, it has been suggested that there might be some way to invoke the consideration of the Supreme Court because of its original jurisdiction provided for in the Constitution.

From a reading of United States Code, Annotated, title 28, section 341, a very complete recital of pertinent circumstances is found, wherein we find (Judicial Code, sec. 233):

"Original jurisdiction: The Supreme Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a State is a party * * *."

In Massachusetts v. Mellon (262 U. S. 44, 67 L. ed. 1078), wherein the court said:

"Under Article III, section 2, of the Constitution, 'judicial power of this court extends to controversies * * * in which a State shall be a party.' The effect of this is not to confer jurisdiction upon the court merely because a State is a party, but only where it is a party to a proceeding of judicial cognizance. Proceedings of a justiciable character are outside of the contemplation of the constitutional grant * * *."

In the United States v. Michigan (190 U. S. 379, 47 L. ed. 1103) Mr. Justice Peckham, speaking for the court, said:

"By its bill the United States invokes the original jurisdiction of this court for the purpose of determining a controversy existing between it and the State of Michigan. This court has jurisdiction of such a controversy, although it is not literally between two States, the United States being a party on the one side and a State on the other."

This was decided in United States v. Texas (143 U. S. 621), and Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, delivering the opinion of the court in Kansas v. United States (204 U. S. 331, 51 L. ed. 510), said:

"On April 30, 1906, the State of Kansas applied for leave to file a bill of complaint against the United States and others, to which the United States objected on the ground for want of jurisdiction. On May 21 leave was granted, without prejudice, and the bill was accordingly filed. As such an application by a State is usually granted as of course, we thought it wise to allow the bill to be filed, but reserving to the United States the right to object to the jurisdiction thereafter; and hence the words 'without prejudice' were inserted in the order."

However, from Kansas v. United States, supra, it seems to be necessary to first receive the consent of the United States to be sued, because therein the court said:

"Again the United States is the real party in interest as defendant and has not consented to be sued, which it can not be without its consent."

Minnesota v. Hitchcock (185 U. S. 373); Oregon v. Hitchcock (202 U. S. 60); U. S. v. Lee (106 U. S. 196).

That case was quoted from with approval in Minnesota v. Hitchcock, supra, where Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion, pointed out that "the judicial power of the United States extends to cases in which the United States is a party plaintiff as well as in the cases where it is the party defendant, for, while all the United States, as a Government, may not be sued without its consent, yet, with its consent it may be sued, and the judicial power of the United States extends to such a controversy."

If President Hoover and Secretary Wilbur still persist in enforcing the presidential pronunciamento and order No. 338 of the Secretary, after the full unconstitutionality of their acts have been brought to their notice by the governors of the Rocky Mountain States, headed by our own fighting Governor Emerson, and, after the grave injustices caused by their above-mentioned orders have also been brought to their attention, then certainly recourse may be had to the courts and the consent of the United States to be sued under the circumstances could probably be obtained by the concerted action of the western Senators, especially if the resolution recently introduced by Senator KING, of Utah, which is to the effect that the constitutionality of the said acts of President Hoover and Secretary Wilbur be investigated by the Senate Judiciary Committee, be adopted. In the event of the above-mentioned consent of the United States being obtained, suit could be brought in the Supreme Court of the United States and the vast delays appertaining to the other route be eliminated and the time and revenues of the States, incidentally of the citizens, would be properly "conserved."

To my way of thinking the legal aspects involved in the case are very simple and are not in the least involved in a multiplicity of questions. The question presenting itself is simply that after a grant has once been made, or a trust declared, accepted and acted upon, even though the United States be the grantor trustee, any attempt by anyone, as agent of the United States, could be permanently enjoined from interfering in any manner whatsoever with the free right of the States to receive revenues from the deposits of oil and gas within their confines.

I think that, if you agree with me in principle as to the matters contained herein, which is simply an injunction suit to prevent a breach of trust, you should call the matter to Governor Emerson's attention and assure him that the matter of enforcing the State's rights in this instance in the Supreme Court is not as complicated as it would at first seem; provided the plans that he has already made to bring about a rescinding of the Mussolinian dictates, above referred to, meet with disdain, already apparent in the matter, or with no favorable action.

Much unfavorable comment is heard regarding the President's failure to answer or acknowledge receipt of the communication addressed to him and signed by the governors of three sovereign States.

It is with the humbleness of a layman, but with the earnestness of a proud citizen of the State of Wyoming, that I submit these suggestions, and if I can be of further assistance to you in the matter, please do not hesitate to call upon me. I would appreciate any comments you care to make in this instance.

With kindest personal regards, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

H. LESLIE PARKER.

P. S.—Wyoming having already received almost $20,000,000 as a result of its 37½ per cent of the equities above referred to, and consequently has inaugurated an unparalleled educational system, is building and has plans for future building a public highway system within the State unsurpassed by any in the Union. Is it any wonder that they should feel aggrieved that any presidential edict should seek to deprive them of their constitutional rights, as is now the circumstance?

Mr. KING. I also have a letter from Mr. Lawrence E. Armstrong, an attorney at Rawlins, Wyo., in which he discusses some of the legal questions involved in the matter referred to, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

RAWLINS, WYO., May 15, 1929.

Senator WILLIAM H. KING,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KING: The announcement of President Hoover on March 12, 1929, contains the following:

"There will be no leases or disposal of Government oil lands, no matter what category they lie in, of Government holdings, or Government controls, except those which may be mandatory by Congress. In other words, there will be complete conservation of Government oil during this administration."

This is a virtual nullification of the act of Congress of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437). After this drastic announcement or order, and on April 22, 1929, in New York, the President made a plea for law obedience and law observance on the part of the citizens of the United States. Many thousands of citizens who have been materially injured by this order are at a loss to understand why the Chief Executive of the land could nullify important acts of Congress and at the same time urge law obedience on the part of the citizens.

On May 3, 1929, the Secretary of the Interior stated that—

"We recommend in all cases where clear and definite evidence is filed showing substantial expenditures for reliable geological surveys upon the lands embraced in oil and gas applications * * * that the same be regarded as a sufficient equitable basis for the allowance of the applications pending on March 12, 1929, and issuance of permits thereon."

Since that date one of the members of the committee appointed by the Secretary has stated that the surveys and geological work referred to, in order to be considered, must be "sufficiently expert and thorough to be of some value to the Government in determining the probable geological structure." This restriction is so drastic that the alleged modification of May 3, above referred to, becomes virtually ineffective.

I think the Judiciary Committee could with propriety find that the Chief Executive is without authority to make an order rendering null an act of Congress. In making the withdrawal order bearing date September 27, 1909, wherein President Taft withdrew from entry certain oil lands in Wyoming and California for naval reserves, the President entertained doubts as to his right to make the withdrawal, and later referred to it in his message to Congress in the following language:

"The power of the Secretary of the Interior to exempt from the operation of existing statutes tracts of lands, the disposition of which under such statutes would be detrimental to public interest, is not clear or satisfactory."

Following this, the Supreme Court of the United States passed upon the question in the case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co. (236 U. S. 459). Justice Lamar wrote the majority opinion of the court. Justices Day, McKenna, and Van Devanter dissented, Justice Day writing an able dissenting opinion, to which dissenting opinion, it seems to me, the court will finally have to pay particular attention. In any event, the Midwest case goes no farther than to state that the Chief Executive, in his discretion, can withdraw certain public lands from entry for specific purposes, or in aid of legislation. So that the Supreme Court has not as yet committed itself as to whether the Chief Executive, in a blanket order, can withdraw all public lands and render null the act of February 25, 1920.

In the case of West v. Work (11 Fed. (2d) 828) the court held, among other things, that the act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), was rather the expression of a new policy for the disposition of public lands open to exploration or entry, by lease instead of by complete alienation. It is clear that the West case correctly states the rule as to the rights of citizens to file applications for permits and have the same properly acted upon by the Secretary of the Interior.

In the case of West v. United States ex rel. Alling (30 Fed. (2d) 739) the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia said relative to the leasing act:

"It will be observed that the act in section 1 expressly provides for the disposition of oil and gas lands through prospecting permits and subsequent leasing 'to citizens of the United States'; and the power vested in the Secretary to establish rules and regulations for the carrying out of the act does not imply the power to establish a rule or regulation that will conflict with an express provision of the act. It follows, we think, that if the applicant sufficiently qualifies as a citizen of the United States, the Secretary is powerless to refuse such applicant a permit or to make any rule or regulation that interferes with the right of such applicant.

"On the question of the illegality of orders made by the Secretary of the Interior in conflict of existing regulations, the case of James v. Germania Iron Co. (167 Fed. 597), is conclusive. The facts in that case were that on February 18, 1889, the Secretary of the Interior decided that a prior entry of a certain tract of land was void; and that the land had been restored to the public domain. Notice of his decision was given the local land officers on February 22, 1889. On February 19, 'A' made an application to enter the land at the local land office. 'B' was the first applicant to enter it after the officers of the local land office had received notice of the decisions canceling the prior entry. The Secretary held that 'A' acquired the superior right to the land, and accordingly issued a patent. The court held that this decision was clearly an error of law; and that 'B,' the first applicant after official notification of the decision had been received at the local land office, was entitled to a decree charging the title under the patent with a trust for his benefit.

"The decision in this case by Judge Sanborn of the eighth judicial circuit, in which Judges Caldwell and Thayer, circuit judges, concurred, is a full and complete announcement of the law as to the power of the Secretary of the Interior to ignore existing regulations. Quoting from the syllabus, which epitomizes the law as announced in the opinion, the court held that 'rules of the Secretary of the Interior can be repealed or abrogated by like formal action and publication only. Decisions or opinions of the Secretary and the commissioner in contests between claimants for specific tracts of land ignoring or violating rules, neither repeal nor modify them.'"

In the case of Tendolle v. Eureka Oil Syndicate, 268 Pac. 185, the Supreme Court of Wyoming held that a person who has filed an application for an oil and gas prospecting permit has acquired an imperfect equitable right, comparable to the right of an entryman of public lands who has not yet perfected his entry, that he is in the process of acquiring the title, and that when the permit or the lease is issued it relates back to the time of the filing of the application.

In the case of Knapp v. Alexander-Edgar Lumber Co., 237 U. S. 162, the court held:

"Laying aside for the moment the effect of the settlement, it is, we think, erroneous to regard the entryman's interest prior to actual possession as being nothing more than a color of title. From the making of his entry the homesteader has the right of possession as against trespassers and all others except the United States; he has also an inchoate title, subject to be defeated only by failure on his part to comply with the requirements of the homestead law as to settlement and cultivation."

In the case of East Central Eureka Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 204 U. S. 266, the court said:

"The provision that the acts shall not impair existing rights is, perhaps, some indication that it extends to inchoate rights which constitutionally it might have impaired. At all events, it should be taken in a liberal sense. There was no sufficient reason why the United States should not be liberal and, as we have said, it was just that it should be."

In the case of State v. Ross, 104 Pac. 216 (Wash.), the court says:

"Nor do we think the law has vested any discretion in the commissioner, where the applicant for a lease has fully complied with its provisions. The act was doubtless passed in pursuance of the liberal policy that has ever marked the conduct of the General Government in disposing of its mineral land, and should be so construed as to effectuate the legislative intent."

By reason of the fact that the Chief Executive of the United States was an outstanding engineer, it was thought by many that his entire official work would be of a constructive nature, such as initiating and constructing the Nicaragua Canal, the construction and completion of the Boulder Dam, the enlarging and developing of ways and means of controlling the Mississippi floods, providing ways and means for the construction of a deep waterway from the Atlantic to the Great Lakes, the building of an international highway from the Rio Grande to Buenos Aires, any one of which would have been a monument to the engineering skill of the Chief Executive, but when his first official act was one of nullification and the setting aside of a new land policy formulated by the best brains of both Houses of Congress, many people lost faith and questioned the sincerity of our Chief Executive. It would appear from the fact that Mr. Requa is the personal representative of the President, that he and George Otis Smith and one or two others may have been the fathers of this policy. We wonder why Mr. Requa, who became many times a millionaire from the copper resources of the United States, would ask for conservation of one of the mineral resources, and not the conservation of others from which he himself has profited immeasurably. Some one has said that wise men change their minds, but fools never do. We still think that our Chief Executive is a wise man and that with a proper presentation of this subject that he will reconsider this policy and permit the leasing act to at least function in every particular as to all applicants and permittees in good standing on March 12, 1929.

Yours truly,

L. E. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. KING. I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a brief prepared by a lawyer of ability and standing in which he canvassed at length the mining laws dealing with oil and other minerals, the leasing act of 1920, and the effect of the President's policy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The brief is as follows:

THE HOOVER CONSERVATION POLICY WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN STATES

Within the week following Mr. Hoover's inauguration the following pronouncement emanated from the White House:

"There will be no leases or disposal of Government oil lands no matter what category they may lie in, of Government holdings or Government controls, except those which may be mandatory by Congress. In other words, there will be complete conservation of Government oil in this administration."

On March 13 all of the United States land offices received orders, by wire, that no oil and gas prospecting permits would be issued on and after March 12 and to reject all applications for permits then pending.

Following this, various press statements were made as to the steps that would be taken to carry out the new policy, and under date of March 20 order No. 338 was issued by the Secretary of the Interior. Part of this order relates to internal procedure of the Land Department, as affecting the public and permit holders and applicants. This order contains three outstanding features, viz:

(a) Refusal to grant any more section 13 permits at all, either on applications then pending or thereafter to be filed.

(b) No further extensions of time will be granted in the absence of an affirmative showing of the expenditure of money on the permit affected, and as a corollary, no new "group-development" programs will be approved.

(c) Refusal to grant leases on the three-fourths area of section 13 permits, on which the law gives the permittee a preference right to a lease, "unless such action is required in the public interest."

REASON FOR THE LEASING ACT

Since oil in the public lands is now disposed of entirely under what is known as the general leasing act of February 25, 1920 (41 Stat. 437), it is pertinent as a preliminary briefly to review the events leading up to that legislation.

Prior to the leasing act of 1920 public oil lands were disposed of by the Government under the placer mining law. Under this law claims were located in areas of from 20 to 160 acres by citizens or associations of citizens; on making of discovery the claimants could procure an absolute patent from the Government. Under this law several important oil fields, particularly in California and Wyoming, were located and brought into production.

In 1909 the Interior Department, being of the opinion that the placer law was an impractical and inappropriate method of disposing of the Government oil lands, recommended to the President that all such lands be withdrawn from entry or appropriation. As a result on September 27, 1909, all public lands known or suspected of being valuable for oil were withdrawn from entry by Executive order. In this connection it may or may not be significant that Mr. George Otis Smith, at present Director of the United States Geological Survey, and who appears prominently in connection with the "new policy," is credited with having been instrumental in bringing about the withdrawals. Strong protests were made against the withdrawals by the claimants and operators thereby affected. One of the chief objections to the withdrawals was that the President had no authority to make them. The matter was taken to Congress and resulted in the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 847), whereby the President was formally authorized to make temporary withdrawals for "water-power sites, irrigation, classification of lands, or other purposes to be specified in the orders of withdrawal," with the proviso "that the rights of any person who at the date of any order of withdrawal heretofore or hereafter made is a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands and who at such date is in diligent prosecution of work leading to the discovery of oil or gas shall not be affected or impaired by such order so long as such claimant or occupant shall continue in diligent prosecution of said work."

The act provided that same should not be construed as a "recognition, abridgment, or enlargement" of any asserted rights by oil claimants as against the previous withdrawal, thus leaving the matter to the courts.

Following the act of June 25, 1910, on July 3, 1910, all the lands theretofore withdrawn on September 27, 1909, were rewithdrawn under authority of the act. The lower courts held the withdrawals of 1909 invalid, but in 1915 the United States Supreme Court, by five to four decision, held these withdrawals valid and effective.

The situation thus produced laid the foundation for a decade of continuous litigation and controversy between the oil-land claimants and the Government, the chief issue being whether the claimant came within the above quoted proviso of the act of June 25, 1910. This litigation involved hundreds of claims in adverse land-office proceedings and suits in the courts; millions of dollars worth of property was tied up; development and prospecting were suspended, and in general the "oil-land controversy" was a pressing question in the public-land States and in Congress, where legislation to meet the situation was pending for several years, and finally resulted in the passage of the general leasing act.

LEASING ACT OF 1920

In general, the leasing act of 1920, as applied to oil, consists of two parts; one referred to as the "relief" sections, provided a method for the settlement, adjustment, and compromise of the claims in litigation then pending, and the other part provides a general system and policy for future administration and disposition of oil in the public lands.

The relief sections provide, as to producing lands, that claimants coming within the provisions of the law could release and relinquish their claims under the placer law to the Government, pay the Government a royalty of 12½ per cent on all oil theretofore produced, and receive a new lease at a royalty to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, but at not less than 12½ per cent. Cases coming under the relief sections have for the most part long since been adjudicated and settled, either by the denial of the right to "relief," or by the granting of leases. Salt Creek in Wyoming and other large producing fields on the public domain are all included in this class of leases, and the production under these leases constitutes the bulk of the production from public lands. The "new policy" will not affect any of this production at all except perhaps as the Government may consent to a temporary curtailment of production.

As to new exploration, administration, and disposition of the public oil lands and deposits, the leasing act authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to grant what is known as a prospecting permit to any qualified applicant for an area of land not exceeding 2,560 acres. Such a permit gives the grantee thereof the right to drill and prospect the land embraced by the permit for a period of two years, and requires that the permittee shall commence drilling on the permit lands within six months from the date of the permit shall drill to a depth of 500 feet within one year from the date of the permit, and to a depth of 2,000 feet within two years from the date of the permit, and with a further provision for an extension of the period of the permit in case the permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to complete the prospecting of the land within the 2-year period of the permit. These provisions are found in section 13 of the act, and the permits are commonly referred to as "section 13 permits."

Under section 14 of the leasing act, if a permittee discovers oil in paying quantities on the area of his permit, he becomes entitled to a lease for 20 years on one-fourth of the area of his permit, but for not less than 160 acres if the permit includes that much land. The permittee is also entitled under the law—

"to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in his prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production, and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act, the royalty to be determined by competitive bidding or fixed by such other method as the Secretary may by regulations prescribe."

EXTENSION ACTS

After the leasing act was passed, it soon became evident that the 2-year period allowed by a prospecting permit was in many cases wholly inadequate for the geological work and drilling operations necessary to test and develop a structure. The department held that the provision for extensions in section 13 above referred to did not become operative until after a well was drilled to a depth of 2,000 feet. The result was that if provision was not made for extending time on the permits, many would lapse, and drilling programs that would otherwise be organized and carried through would not be undertaken. Congress, recognizing the situation, has passed three extension acts, viz: January 11, 1922, for three years; April 5, 1926, for two years; March 9, 1928, for two years.

The act of March 9, 1928, authorizes the Secretary to extend for an additional period of two years any oil or gas prospecting permit issued under the act of February 25, 1920, or extended under the act of January 11, 1922, or as further extended under the act of April 15, 1926, "if he shall find that the permittee has been unable with the exercise of reasonable diligence to begin drilling operations or to drill wells of a depth and within the time required by existing law, or has drilled wells of a depth within the time required by existing law and has failed to discover oil or gas and desires to prosecute further exploration."

The former acts were substantially to the same effect.

Under these acts, the regulations require that the permittee shall make a full showing, under oath, of the facts on the basis of which he seeks to procure an extension of time; extensions are granted only on such showing and ordinarily have not been for more than six months or a year at a time, coupled with a warning that if actual progress in the way of development is not made in the meantime, no further extensions will be granted.

By these acts Congress no doubt intended that though permittees should be held to reasonable diligence, they would on the other hand be given fair and reasonable treatment in the way of time in which to test and develop the lands that they had acquired under their permits. The clear purpose of these acts was to aid and encourage development, and to prevent loss from the lapse of permits without opportunity to complete drilling or other work leading to development which might be undertaken.

EXPLORATORY AND DEVELOPMENT OPERATIONS UNDER THE LEASING ACT

Exploratory and development operations have now been proceeding under the system above described for nine years. In that time, up to March 1, 1929, the department had granted 34,950 prospecting permits under the provisions of section 13 of the act; of this number, 14,690 permits have been canceled, presumably in most cases for failure to comply with the requirements of the permits, indicating that the department has consistently insisted that permittees exercise reasonable diligence, or submit to the cancellation of their permits. This left 20,260 permits outstanding on March 1, 1929, a great majority of which it is presumed were in good standing as a result of extensions granted on proper showings as otherwise they were subject to cancellation.

Reports further show that as a result of granting 34,950 permits over a period of nine years, 56 leases have been granted under the provisions of section 14 of the act, by reason of the discovery of oil or gas in paying quantities on section 13 permits. The department has not disclosed the amount of production from these leases, but it is known in a general way that a few are fairly productive leases, and that others are of comparatively small value, while a considerable number are for gas production. The production from the leases granted on section 13 permits in all the Mountain States is in all probability less than 5,000 barrels per day, or about one-fifth of 1 per cent of the average daily production in the United States. This is certainly not a very impressive showing for nine years' operation under sections 13 and 14 of the leasing act. It should be understood that the new policy will have no effect on the production from or the operation under the 56 leases that have been granted. The only thing the new policy will affect is the possible additional production which may be developed by continuing under the same policy and procedure that have heretofore obtained. The results of the first nine years of operation are cited only to show what can, or can not, be expected from proceeding in the same manner for a further period of years. In view of the fact that during the past nine years development has proceeded on structures which were considered as having the best prospects of producing oil or gas in paying quantities but on which development had been deferred owing to the existence of the withdrawals mentioned above, it is fair to assume that greatly less may be reasonably expected in the next nine years, the remaining unexplored lands naturally being those considered less likely to contain oil or gas.

It must not be understood from the above, however, that active and aggressive exploration has not been carried on. An estimate made from careful check of the wells actually drilled in the Mountain States show that not less than $20,000,000 has been expended for geological work and drilling operations in the Mountain States since 1920 on structures on which all or a large portion of the lands were public lands held under section 13 permits. More than 250 test wells have been drilled on nearly that number of different structures. What this has meant in development and business activity in the communities affected is, of course, apparent.

In the State of Utah, for instance, it is estimated that approximately $5,000,000 has been expended in drilling on section 13 permit lands without bringing in a single commercial oil pool. However, at least one sizable commercial gas field has been discovered in Utah; that is to say, a gas field which would probably be considered a commercial field on account of the probable volume and quantity of gas it contains were it located near any populous area. In Utah the prospecting for oil on section 13 permits during the past nine years has also resulted in the discovery of a large deposit of helium at Woodside, a large deposit of practically pure carbon-dioxide gas near Price, and what promises to be an extensive deposit of potash near Green River. Furthermore, this drilling and prospecting in Utah has eliminated from further consideration as possible oil-bearing lands many thousands of acres theretofore covered by the above-mentioned withdrawals and has disclosed geological information of great importance and value with regard to a greatly larger area, all of which is of inestimable value as it applies to the development, production, and conservation of natural resources in this territory.

The experience in other public-land States has been somewhat similar to that in Utah. Vast areas have been thoroughly prospected for oil and have been found to be barren, while in Wyoming, Colorado, and Montana particularly some new fields have been discovered. It is safe to say that more has been learned of the underground geology and of the oil and gas possibilities of the lands within the boundaries of the Mountain States during the past nine years on account of the drilling and prospecting operations in this territory on section 13 permits than during the entire period preceding the passage of the general leasing act. The significance of this is that in case of the happening of a great public emergency, such as that of the recent World War, the waste of energy, time, and money which would necessarily result in going through similar pioneer prospecting and drilling will have been eliminated by reason of what has already been done in this regard. Also, the prospecting and development of the remaining undeveloped structures on the public lands in these States will be less hazardous and expensive, owing to the valuable geological and other information which has been gained by reason of the operations under the leasing act. In view of the above it would seem that the public interest would be best served and an intelligent program of conservation could be better worked out with regard to the oil and gas possibilities of the areas yet unprospected in the public-land States if further development and prospecting be permitted and encouraged, and not by cutting it off short, as has been done by the so-called new conservation order of the President. This phase of the situation is referred to farther below.

REFUSAL TO GRANT PERMITS

As above stated, one of the outstanding features of the new policy is the refusal to grant any more permits at all, either on application pending or on new applications. It is reported that there were 5,000 or more applications for new permits pending at the time the new orders went into effect. All the pending applications are being rejected and no new applications are being received by the land offices. Obviously the purpose and effect is absolutely to put a stop to future exploration and development on the public lands in the Mountain States. Since practically every structure tested is all or part public land, and development will not ordinarily be undertaken unless all the lands on a structure are included in the development program, the new orders mean a practically complete cessation of new exploration in these States. The public lands in the Mountain States are, in round figures, as follows:

	Acres
Colorado	22,000,000
Montana	26,000,000
New Mexico	27,000,000
Utah	33,000,000
Wyoming	26,000,000

The refusal to grant permits will in many instances cause loss and damage to oil operators who have expended large sums for geological investigations on the basis of which the permits were applied for. In other cases where many thousands of dollars have been expended and where expensive geological work was in course of completion in the field when the conservation orders were issued, all in contemplation of filing permit applications later and in reliance upon the policy and practice of the department during the past nine years, it is all practically wasted.

This phase of the new orders raises the question as to whether the Secretary of the Interior has power or authority to set aside the operation of the leasing act by refusing to grant permits in this manner. The effect of the orders is the same in this regard as if President Wilson had promptly upon the approval of the leasing act issued the same order.

Section 13 of the act states that the Secretary "is hereby authorized, under such necessary and proper rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant qualified under this act a prospecting permit." The title of the leasing act is "to promote the mining of coal, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain." Section 1 of the act provides that deposits of oil or gas and lands containing such deposits owned by the United States "shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act." Section 37 of the act provides that such deposits of oil and gas "shall be subject to disposition only in the form and manner provided in this act." Obviously the Secretary "is hereby authorized" to grant permits under section 13 in order to give effect to the clear provision in section 1 that such oil and gas "shall be subject to disposition in the manner and form provided by this act"; while by the provision in section 37 the Secretary is enjoined from making any other disposition of the oil and gas in the public domain. Can there be any doubt in the light of these provisions that Congress authorized the Secretary to grant permits with the clear intention and purpose that he would grant them as provided in section 1? Moreover, the circumstances and conditions under which the leasing act was passed indicate the intention of Congress to break away from the effect of the withdrawals and put into operation a new and comprehensive leasing system for the public lands. To give the Secretary discretionary authority to suspend the operation of this act would in effect authorize the Secretary to reinstate the withdrawals which the leasing act was intended to abrogate. In fact, in its administration of the leasing act the Interior Department has formally ruled that all said withdrawals are vacated and superseded by the leasing act and so held at the time of the issuance of the new orders.

It is understood that the Secretary cites as authority for his action in refusing to grant any section 13 permits a provision in the regulations issued shortly after the leasing act was passed, that—

"The granting of a prospecting permit for oil and gas is discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior, and any application may be granted or denied either in part or in its entirety, as the facts may be deemed to warrant."

This is probably true as to the granting of individual permit applications; in other words, the Secretary is the official in whom the authority is vested to determine whether or not an applicant for a permit is a qualified applicant under the law, and whether the lands that such applicant seeks to acquire are properly available for appropriation under the law; that is to say, whatever discretionary authority the Secretary has is a "judicial discretion," to be exercised in individual cases for the purpose of carrying out the law, but not to defeat or repeal it. This is undoubtedly all that this provision in the regulations ever meant, or was intended to mean, and to give it any wider significance is to extend its application beyond any power or authority possessed by the Secretary under the act.

It should be particularly noted in this connection that the new orders direct the rejection of all applications for permits that had theretofore been filed and were then pending before the department. Under the regulations, practice, and procedure in force and effect when said applications were filed, permits would have been granted thereon in all proper cases in the regular course of business. It is a settled principle of the land practice that the rights of an applicant or entryman relate to and are determined as of the time such application for entry is initiated. True, the applicant does not acquire any rights under a permit until it has issued, but he has the right to have the permit issued on the basis of the conditions, practice, and regulations at the time his application is filed. This is fundamental and the Secretary's ruling otherwise is directly contrary to the consistent rules and practice of the Interior Department for 50 years.

Under the telegraphic order of March 13, mentioned above, all applications for permits then pending in the district land offices have been rejected and the filing fees returned to the applicants. The registers of some land offices, Utah for instance, forthwith returned all pending applications accompanied by receiver's check covering the amount of filing fee deposited with the application, without right of appeal, merely reciting in the notice of rejection that such action was being taken under direction of said telegraphic order from the Secretary. Some other land offices, however, promptly upon receipt of the telegraphic order from the Secretary, by registered mail notified the permit applicant that he was allowed 30 days from receipt of the notice, within which to either withdraw his application for permit and request return of his filing fee, or appeal from the decision. In the same notice though, the permit applicant was informed that the notice was being sent to him under direction of the telegraphic order which was made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, thus in effect leaving the permit applicant with the alternative remedy of appealing to the departmental officials who had in advance already passed on the merits of his case without allowing him the opportunity to be heard.

In a number of cases where the right of appeal was so formally given by the register, the applicants filed their appeals and specifications of errors within the 30 days allowed and respectfully declined to withdraw their applications or to request the return of or to receive their filing fees. But in each instance either prior to the expiration of the 30 days appeal period or before their appeals and specifications of error had been transmitted to Washington they were served with a further notice signed by the commissioner and stamped "approved by the Secretary" finally rejecting their applications and closing the cases and returning their filing fees. Some of these applicants have filed motions for rehearing before the Secretary and others have taken, or are contemplating taking, further appeal on the theory that the rubber-stamp blanket approval of the commissioner's order of rejection by the Secretary does not constitute a final decision by the Secretary on the merits in the particular case.

Many hundreds of permit applicants served with similar orders have taken no action whatever, and in some cases have cashed their receiver's checks covering their filing fee, for the reason that they have been ignorant of their rights under the law or on account of the impracticability and cost of sending attorneys to Washington to protect their rights by proper and timely suits in the District of Columbia courts for the purpose of securing a court decision on the question of the Secretary's authority and power to take such arbitrary action. In many cases the time within which court action could be taken had elapsed before the notices had actually reached the permit applicant, as said notices were sent by ordinary mail in most cases and delivered to agents of the applicants, or others who were unauthorized to receive same.

In one New Mexico case the permit applicant had filed his application many months before the new orders were issued, but had failed to have his application notarized. His application was returned from Washington for this to be done, but before it could be accomplished his application was finally rejected with no right of appeal. Had his application been properly notarized his permit would have been granted before the new orders came out.

In this New Mexico case the application involved covered so-called key lands on the structure, and the applicant and his associates had expended large sums of money in geologizing and surveying the structure in acquiring operating rights on other lands on the structure and were preparing to drill immediately upon the issuance of the new permit, which was rejected.

In several California cases where applicants had applied for permits several weeks before the new orders came out, and after having expended large sums of money for operating rights on fee lands on the same structure and in geologizing and surveying the structure and their applications were denied and their filing fees returned without right of appeal. It happened in those cases that the areas covered by the permit applications were surrounded or partially surrounded by fee lands, or by issued permits in good standing, and that the drilling sites for test wells on the structures were on the fee lands or on the issued permits, thus endangering the lands applied for by the drainage which will automatically take place when drilling is done on the surrounding lands.

In a Wyoming case a responsible oil company was having a structure geologized a year or so ago and found that part of it was covered with prospecting permits held by individuals and that also there was some unappropriated public land. The structure is upon what was unsurveyed land, and the permit applicants designated the area applied for by metes and bounds. It developed that there are discrepancies in the Government surveys adjoining these lands and at the time the permits were applied for last summer the Government was requested to make the necessary surveys in order that the lands applied for may be properly identified. In anticipation of the granting of these particular permits upon completion of the survey (the applications by the way covering lands offsetting the test well site) drilling was commenced on the area covered by issued permits. Twenty-five thousand dollars had been expended to build a road to the location and $50,000 was already in the well when the Secretary's telegraphic order was issued, and, as a result, the permit applications were rejected and the filing fees returned without right of appeal. The operator, by the way, had secured operating rights from the permit applicants, if and when the permit should be granted and had every reason to suppose that the permits would be granted under the policy and practice of the past nine years.

In another case an application for permit was filed several months prior to the issuance of the new orders. This application was filed at a drawing held under authority from the commissioner and covered lands which had theretofore been covered by a permit which had been canceled, the drawing then being the method of determining to whom a second permit may be granted upon the cancellation of a subsisting permit. This particular applicant drew the lucky number and his application was forwarded to Washington with the notation on a card attached thereto that the permit "shall be allowed." The status of this applicant to a preferential right to a permit was thus established by machinery set up by the Government. An operator having no reason to question the applicant's right to a permit under these circumstances and in reliance upon the Government's practice in many similar cases in the past purchased the applicant's operating rights for $10,000. The permit had not been issued prior to the new orders, but was finally rejected and the applicant's filing fee was returned without right of appeal having been given him.

Numerous similar cases could be cited in which equities acquired in reliance upon the department's practice over the period since the passage of the leasing act have been arbitrarily and ruthlessly ignored in the administration of the orders to reject all pending applications for permits.

REFUSAL OF EXTENSIONS

The above-mentioned order, No. 338, states that applications for extension not involving expenditures of money in development work will be denied by the General Land Office. Heretofore the department has been fairly reasonable in granting extensions of time in cases where climatic conditions interfered with development, and for the purpose of doing necessary geological work to determine if and where to drill a test well. So far as can be determined from the announcements of the department, thus far made, extensions for these reasons will no longer be granted. In fact, it is quite apparent from what the department has said that the Secretary intends to exercise his discretion under the extension acts to defeat the clear purpose and intention of those acts as far as possible. It is also clear that no reliance whatever can be placed on conditions which a permittee could heretofore fairly depend upon to get his permit extended. Permittees under these circumstances, after having done what would have been considered necessary to procure a further extension, now find themselves confronted with a probable cancellation of their permits under a new rule. In a number of cases where the holder of the permit is able to drill, and will drill rather than lose his permit, the new policy will compel drilling at once on a considerable number of permits on which drilling might otherwise be deferred for a reasonable time, with the result just the opposite of what is intended by this alleged conservation policy.

It is also true that local officers in the district land offices have advised permittees not to apply for extensions of time until called upon by the General Land Office to show cause why their permits should not be canceled under the old practice or to wait until their plans for drilling have been completed before seeking extensions of their permits. There are hundreds of such cases which have been lulled into security by the employees of the land offices only to find themselves divested of their rights under the new orders.

WHAT IS GROUP DEVELOPMENT?

As a corollary to the refusal to grant extensions is the announcement that "group or contributory development should not be authorized in any cases in the future."

Hereinabove the term "structure" has been frequently used; the same term is used in the leasing act, probably for the first time in a statute. By "structure" is meant a geological feature or condition resulting in a more or less limited and well-defined area or field of present or prospective production of oil and gas. There are monoclinal and anticlinal structures, the latter being the type, however, from which practically all the production in the Rocky Mountain States has been obtained. Structures vary in size from a few acres to several thousand acres. Ordinarily one well properly located on the apex of the anticline or dome will afford a test of that structure. To drill more than one well at the same time on an unproved wildcat structure or to drill a test well down the flank of such a structure would of course be a clear economic waste. The department has therefore recognized this practical situation and has evolved a simple method of meeting it by ruling that where a test well is being drilled on one permit on a structure all the other permits for lands on the same structure (which in most cases would cover down-flank areas) on behalf of which contributions are made to the test well, will be considered as having exercised diligence sufficient to entitle them to extensions from time to time during the pendancy of the test within which to comply with the drilling requirements under their particular permits. Obviously this is just practical good sense. While it is true that this group-development proposition is not in terms provided for in the leasing act, it is clearly within the scope of the extension acts and the broad powers of the Secretary to make all necessary regulations to carry the leasing act into effect, and has been approved in principle by Congress by section 5 of the act of March 3, 1927, relating to permits on Executive order Indian reservations, wherein it is provided that "a substantial contribution to the drilling of the geologic structure by such applicant for permit thereon may be considered as prospecting under the provisions hereof."

No operating company will drill a wildcat test well at its sole expense with the holders of adjacent land sitting by awaiting the results. Ordinarily the holders of the various permits on a structure are unable personally to make contributions of the large amounts necessary to drill an expensive test, it being a fact, by the way, that an adequate test on a wildcat structure in the Rocky Mountain region ordinarily costs from $75,000 to $200,000, depending on the accessibility, depth of drilling, and other physical conditions. This necessitates a complete new set-up to make the drilling of a test well possible. Other companies will not come in and take over the operating rights on the various outlying permits unless they are assured that a test well will be drilled in the proper place on the structure. This leads to the necessity of one competent operator underwriting the drilling of the test, whereupon other operators with the necessary funds will come in and acquire permit acreage or operating rights thereon and thereby contribute to the test. Doubtless the great majority of expensive deep tests which have been drilled on permit lands have been made possible by reason of arrangements along these lines, all with full departmental knowledge and approval. In pursuance of this practical and common-sense procedure, millions of dollars have been invested in securing operating rights, doing geological work, and in drilling operations, in reliance upon the continuity and integrity of departmental practice. If group development is to be abandoned and present group-development programs interfered with, it is quite apparent that it will not only put an end to any new exploration drilling on most structures, but will greatly impair or destroy the value of holdings in existing group-development programs now being carried out. In these group set-ups the original permittees usually reserve royalties on all production; these royalties and interests therein have been widely sold and traded in, with the result that in the aggregate they represent a large investment which is seriously jeopardized by the new policy.

THE TEXAS CASE

This is the first important case on which the Secretary has taken action under the new policy. It is difficult, if not impossible, to get a fair picture of the situation from the decision of April 8, 1929, in the nature of a report and recommendation of the Secretary's committee, approved by the Secretary.

It appears that in December, 1927, the department authorized extensions on 32 permits, on condition that five wells should be drilled under the group-development plan; this requirement was complied with. In February, 1928, the department authorized extensions on 46 permits, part of which had been included in the 1927 program, on condition that the company should drill the equivalent of three wells and comply with the requirements of paragraph 2 of the permits on which no wells were actually drilled in the 1927 program. The company drilled four wells to completion and another nearly completed, but only partially complied with the drilling requirements on the permits not drilled in the 1927 program.

Presentation of the 1929 program was started in September, 1929. The department then showed a disposition to recede from further group-development programs and to fall back on the "rule of administration" (3-mile rule, which, by the way, recognizes as diligence sufficient to merit extensions only contributions by permittees whose permits lie within a radius of 3 miles from the location of the test well). In January, 1929, the company renewed its proposal for 78 permits in all. This was denied in February, on the 16th, but the company was advised that a revised proposal would be considered, and same was forthwith submitted. It is understood that this proposal was substantially what the department had indicated would be acceptable. What the proposal was is not stated. At this point the heavy hand of the new policy clamped down. The decision then proceeds:

"The plan of permitting group development had been one designed to encourage and expedite exploratory drilling, but the company had long been put on notice that such encouragement was no longer considered necessary in southeastern New Mexico. Now, the President's policy of conservation with respect to oil and gas resources of the public domain is designed to discourage for the present and to retard drilling operations that may lead to the untimely discovery and production of oil and gas resources now unknown, and to retain such resources in Government ownership and under Government control until such time as their discovery and exploitation will be in the public interest.

"The procedure under the new policy is planned to discard the incompatible plan of group development and to protect such equities as may have been acquired through the expenditures of substantial sums of money in actual development work."

The 78 permits are divided into two groups, viz, the 45 in the 1928 program and the 33 not so included. Of the group of 45, 6 were already extended to future dates, 5 were found in good standing by discovery, and 34 permits were found in default, most of them only since December 31, 1928, and the committee recommends that in pursuance of the President's policy "the belated general proposal for extensions (started in September, 1928, and the revised proposal evidently agreed to by the department in February) be denied, and proceedings to cancel be instituted immediately."

Leaving out of consideration the additional 33 permits proposed to be included in the 1929 program, it is perfectly evident that when the 1928 program was agreed to both the department and the company knew and expected that only a small number of the 45 permits would be drilled that year, when all the permits would be due for a further extension, and that if that year's program was carried out to the letter still further programs would have to be provided for to make any adequate exploration of the area on which the work was started and to protect the permits in the group. Instead, the approved plan for 1928 is used merely as a trap to catch 34 permits in the flimsiest default, cancel them, and thus destroy the value represented thereby to the permittees, royalty holders, and the company.

The Texas case is cited by the Secretary as an example of "doing equity" under the new policy.

What the decision fails to mention is that the company has expended $600,000 in these drilling operations in reliance on a square deal from the department.

Of the group of 33 permits, 7 were in good standing, 2 on which contributions to a well had been made were extended to August 28, 1929, to comply with the requirements of paragraphs 2, 3, and 4—to drill 2,000 feet—and the other 24 are to be canceled out, though a number thereof had theretofore been extended to January 24, 1929, and development was no doubt provided for in the proposed drilling program for 1929.

It should be understood that the southeastern New Mexico area in which all these permits are situated, is a geological conundrum, the producing portions of which can only be ascertained by drilling over the entire area of some 70 or 80 townships—1,500,000 acres. This peculiar condition amply justifies the character of "group development" heretofore authorized in that area. So far some 50 deep wells have been drilled or are drilling, at a cost of from $30,000 to $60,000 each, of which only about 7 wells may be classed as oil producers, and some of them not of much consequence.

DENIAL OF SECONDARY LEASES

Perhaps the most arbitrary, indefensible, and confiscatory aspect of the new policy is the announcement that "where a permittee is entitled to a lease because of discovery, it is mandatory to lease only one-fourth of the area under a strict interpretation of the President's oil policy, except that when the permit covers 160 acres or less, the permittee would be entitled to lease the full acreage. The remainder will not be leased unless such action is required in the public interest."

It was later stated that if and when, if ever, the Secretary decides such action to be in the public interest, the preference right of the permittee will be recognized on such terms as the Secretary may determine.

Section 14 of the leasing act provides: "The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right to a lease for the remainder of the land in his prospecting permit at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of production, and under such other conditions as are fixed in oil and gas leases in this act, the royalty to be determined by competitive bidding, or fixed by such other method as the Secretary may prescribe; provided that the Secretary shall have the right to reject any or all bids."

This lease on the balance of the area is ordinarily referred to as the "secondary" or "B" lease, while the lease on one-fourth of the area at 5 per cent royalty to the Government is called a "primary" or "A" lease.

Under the above-quoted provision, when a permittee makes a discovery on his permit, he is just as much entitled, under the plain terms of the law, to exercise his preference right for a secondary lease as he is entitled to a primary lease. The only thing left for the Secretary to determine is the method by which the royalty shall be fixed.

In fact the departmental practice up to March 12 of this year required that both the primary and the secondary leases must be applied for and granted at the same time, and, if for any reason a permittee who had made discovery on his permit preferred not to take his secondary lease (whether because the drilling on the permit disclosed the land to be off structure or otherwise valueless for oil or gas or for any other reason), he was not permitted to discard it or relinquish it unless he consent to take an "A" or primary lease only for one-fourth of the remaining land and a secondary lease for the balance of the good land, both leases to be granted at the same time. Obviously no applicants would consent to being thus penalized and they have rather taken the two leases at the same time and paid rentals each year upon the secondary lease land regardless of their value for oil or gas. However, the old practice does provide that, once the two leases have issued and the first year's Government rentals have been paid on both, then the lessee may relinquish any part or all of the area contained in either without suffering the penalty above mentioned. This ruling is mentioned merely to call attention to the fact that heretofore both leases (secondary and primary) must be taken simultaneously, and all drilling and prospecting upon permits has been undertaken with the understanding that both leases would be so issued upon discovery.

In the early days of the leasing act, the Secretary promulgated a regulation to the effect that the permittee, upon making discovery, would have a preference right to receive a secondary lease at a royalty arbitrarily fixed on a graduated scale of from 12½ to 33⅓ per cent royalty to the Government, and this has been the rule and practice up to the time of the announcement of the new policy.

As will be seen from the above, when a permittee acquired and drilled his permit lands, he did so with the clear understanding that if he made a discovery he would be able to procure a primary lease on one-fourth of the area and a secondary lease on three-fourths of the area, on the terms above indicated. In other words, the Secretary has decided to deny the permittees three-fourths of what he contracted for when he spent his good money for the development and exploration of his permit area, in most cases wildcat in character and of unknown possibilities and uncertain value, unless and until, in some distant future time, the Secretary might decide that the recognition of the preference right would be in the public interest (whatever that term may mean).

As above indicated, the Secretary has no authority under the law to deny the secondary lease; but assuming that he has such authority, to deny the secondary lease is downright bad faith on the part of the department, which can only result in undermining public confidence in departmental action generally and render Government lease titles too hazardous to justify the investment of capital therein.

OVERPRODUCTION

Ostensibly this new policy has been inaugurated as one step in a general program of conservation and curtailment of oil production throughout the country which, in reason and rightly handled, everybody favors. As above indicated, any possible effect of the new policy on the production from public lands is entirely negligible. Besides, there is no overproduction in the Rocky Mountain States; in fact, notwithstanding extensive exploration drilling and the bringing in of some new fields during recent years, these States have not begun to hold their own, as shown by the following statement of total oil production since and including 1920:

	Barrels
1920	17,282,000
1921	20,950,000
1922	29,261,000
1923	47,653,000
1924	42,856,000
1925	35,550,000
1926	36,937,000
1928	29,077,000

It will be noted that the production from the Rocky Mountain States as shown above is an average of less than 80,000 barrels daily, or about 3 per cent of the production of the entire country. It will be further noted that the production for 1928 was 40 per cent less than the peak year of 1923, since when there has been a gradual decline. Obviously the problem in these States is to keep their production up to normal—to find something to curtail and conserve.

For purposes of comparison, the following table shows the production from public lands for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and what this means to the States affected.

State	Production (barrels)	Royalty value to State
California	6,334,748.72	$674,647.34
Colorado	921,640.81	51,631.43
Louisiana	9,509.01	3,829.21
Montana	768,285.87	77,933.25
New Mexico	72,383.96	13,248.85
Oklahoma	602,165.40	147,974.25
Utah	2,254.83	4,784.00
Wyoming	14,370,549.38	2,761,451.08
Total	23,370,549.38	3,735,451.41

There are about 28 refineries, large and small, now operating in the Rocky Mountain States, with a total refining capacity of about 120,000 barrels per day, which is about 3½ per cent of the capacity of all the operating refineries in the United States; the refineries in the Mountain States are actually operating, however, at less than two-thirds and probably not over 50 per cent of their total capacity, besides there are 10 plants with a capacity of 7,150 barrels which are shut down. As everybody knows, oil fields invariably become exhausted, and in the event of inability to find new production to keep up the supply of crude, the existing refineries must gradually shut down and/or further curtail their operations, thus adversely affecting what has become an important industry in these States.

In the matter of markets, the product of the Mountain States refineries is confined to supplying their natural trade territory as defined largely by freight rates, but much of the territory is highly competitive with other sources, with the result that these refineries supply about 40 per cent of the gasoline consumed in their trade territory; a third of the gasoline consumed in Colorado, for instance, comes from midcontinent.

CONSERVATION

While more or less related, the questions of overproduction and conservation should not be confused. Conservation relates particularly to avoiding waste, either in time of plenty or in time of scarcity. As stated by the Committee of Nine to the Federal Conservation Board:

"We take it that true conservation does not mean withholding from present use any of the Nation's natural resources. It does mean that those resources should be drawn upon without waste and in orderly response to the economic needs of the country."

The committee further stated that "the evidence is conclusive that there is no substantial waste after oil is once produced," and the waste resulting from overproduction consists for the most part of losses from storage and from failure to recover the full oil content from the sands, due primarily to impairment of the gas pressure.

It is well known that the Government-controlled fields in the Mountain States and in California are practically the only ones where unit operations, regulated production, and scientific conservation methods are in real force and effect, and have been for years. Salt Creek is invariably pointed to by all authorities on this subject as the outstanding example of scientific operation. As a result, the field has been producing for 18 years; has produced over 200,000,000 barrels of oil; produced 14,000,000 barrels in 1928, and has paid the Government more than $40,000,000 in royalties since 1920, in addition to the royalties on "past production" for the period prior to 1920. In 1923, when overproduction threatened, the operators promptly got together on a prorating plan, whereby production was held down to pipe line, refinery, and market requirements.

There is nothing that the new policy can accomplish in the interest of true conservation of production from the public lands.

SPECULATIVE PERMITS

Various statements have appeared to the effect that one reason for the new policy is that the privileges of the leasing act in the matter of prospecting permits has been "abused"; that many permits were acquired by those without means for development, the permittees depending upon the hope and expectation of negotiating and dealing with a competent oil operator; that there has been no good-faith effort to develop, or money expended on a great number of the outstanding permits; and that instances are known of promoters acquiring permits over a large area of land having no possible oil value, merely to sell and assign such permits to persons uninformed in the facts.

As to this, in the first place, the law grants to every citizen the right to apply for a permit, and its bounty, if such it may be called, is not limited to those with money. This has been a rule of every public land law that was ever passed. There is no way for the average citizen without means to derive any benefit from the leasing act except to get his permit, and to endeavor to deal in and with respect to it in some way by which he may derive an interest or profit. In the next place, there is no evidence that anybody has made any effort to ascertain what if any permits were acquired in bad faith and to deal with them as the facts may warrant; on the contrary, this new policy with its disastrous consequences, has been put into effect as to all permits. In the next place, as hereinabove indicated, no permits have been extended without a full showing under oath, and considerably more than one-third of the permits granted have been canceled before the new orders for failure to comply with the permit requirements. On this showing, there is little evidence that the department has not heretofore administered the law with all the care and diligence consistent with the fair and reasonable administration of the public land laws that has always heretofore characterized the Land Department. Lastly, let us assume that many permits have been acquired "speculatively," with little or no intention or possibility of developing; what harm has been done? Certainly the failure to drill and develop these permits has not injured the cause of conservation or overproduction. Moreover, careful inquiry among those in close touch with the situation discloses the fact to be that there are no abuses of the leasing act, in the slightest degree inimicable to the interests of the Government or the public. On the face of it, what possible harm could come from granting or extending any number of permits over which the department has complete control which it can exercise at any time? Or what harm can come from extending permits which cover lands which have no possible chance of containing oil or what good can come from canceling them? The talk of abuse of the law is a smoke screen to detract attention from the abuses of power in this new policy.

THE INTEREST OF THE STATES

The passage of the leasing act involved many compromises. One of the chief objections to the bill in Congress was that it contemplated an entirely new system for the disposition of public lands and resources, whereby the Government would remain a perpetual landlord within the States, thereby depriving the States of the right of taxation of such lands and resources for the support of their governments and institutions on the same basis as the older States. This was compromised by providing that the States should receive 37½ per cent of the income from leasing operations under the act, along with the right to tax production and equipment the same as other State property, and by further providing that 52½ per cent of such income should be allocated for reclamation purposes, of which the public-land States would be the chief beneficiaries. The figures above cited will show what this means to the States affected. Obviously, such a comprehensive and interdependent system, enacted and placed in full operation over a period of years, can not be dislocated or revoked without serious and far-reaching effect on the rights and interests of those States; the States are in effect partners of the Federal Government, and whatever bare legal right or control the Federal Government may have, certainly no change should be made in such a system without the consent and approval of the States.

By reason of this interest of the States, on March 30, 1929, the Governors of Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado, concurred in by the Governor of Montana, addressed a letter to the President in the nature of a protest against the new policy, pointing out their objections thereto and suggesting more equitable means of accomplishing the purposes which the President and the Secretary of the Interior apparently have in mind. This letter was replied to under date of April 12, 1929, by the Secretary of the Interior. Among other things he says that "it is, of course, the instruction of the President and the desire of myself to deal fairly with permittees"; that "the simple purpose of the Government is to reserve as much oil as possible against the time—unfortunately not far distant—when our national supplies diminish"; that "your oil resources are now being dissipated at prices which bring no adequate return to the Federal Government and State governments in royalties or to the industry"; that "the Secretary might relieve against drilling on existing leases"; that "as to approved existing permits in good standing, the law contemplates development and drilling on permits with diligence to a discovery"; that "permit applicants have no equities that should be recognized"; that "permittees, however, are in a different class. They have been recognized by the department as having rights under the law, and every effort will be made to protect them"; that "the Texas case is an example of how the department intends to do equity and justice; and, finally, "that the refusal of the department to grant secondary leases is adhered to."

As herein shown, nothing contained in the new policy can have any appreciable effect on the problem of overproduction or the price of oil. The Secretary disregards the clear purpose of the extension acts which are as much a part of the law as the requirements of diligence in the development of permits. In the same breath, the Secretary deprecates overproduction, and insists on compliance with the highest degree of diligence in drilling on permits. As to the grant of permits and secondary leases, the Secretary stands pat, without giving any reason or excuse for such arbitrary action other than a reiteration of the department's misconstruction of the law. In brief, the Secretary's reply to the governors gives no comfort to those adversely affected by the new policy. In the meantime every action taken by the Secretary in specific cases belies his protestations to the governors and others that he intends to deal fairly and equitably with permittees, and such a thing as legal rights is entirely in the discard.

RESULTS

From the foregoing, it is apparent that if this policy is carried out as apparently now contemplated, it is bound to accomplish its avowed purpose of blocking further development in the Rocky Mountain States for an indefinite period, except on those permits which must be drilled with all speed to protect them. Areas like extreme western Wyoming and southeastern Idaho, in which much interest has been taken during the past two years, are completely off the map, for no responsible operator could afford to attempt drilling under present conditions.

The denial of pending permit applications, the refusal to give reasonable force and effect to the extension acts, the reversal of action on incomplete group developments entered into with departmental approval, and the refusal to grant secondary leases, if continued, will almost completely wipe out the value that has been attached to permits and interests therein, reaching in the aggregate many millions of dollars, under the system that has been built up solely on the basis of the integrity and fairness of departmental action. In many instances this loss must be suffered by people of small means. Business, communities, and the States are likewise adversely affected, and development in the Rocky Mountain States will receive a setback from which it will not recover for many years.

Mr. KING. In conclusion I offer the following resolution, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD at this point and referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 103) was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to immediately reinstate all oil-prospecting permits that have been canceled from the 12th day of March, 1929, and to reinstate the same as of the date of their cancellation.

THE MISSISSIPPI FLOOD SITUATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have not read the Senator's resolution, but I was very much disturbed a few days ago when I was approached by an eminent gentleman from the West, a professor of hydraulic engineering in one of the great universities. He told me a very distressing tale about the plan we have had for improvement of the Mississippi River. He said the Government would be caught holding the bag with a loss of a billion dollars, and there would be no accomplishment of the purpose intended by Congress in enacting the legislation. If that is the matter which the Senator from North Dakota has in mind I feel, from the confidence I have in this particular expert, that it is a matter which deserves the attention of this body.

Mr. FRAZIER. That is exactly the proposition I have in mind.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not misunderstand me. I believe fully that the matter deserves the attention of the Senate, but it seems to me that an important matter of this kind should always be referred to the committee having such matters in charge.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I am going to submit a brief statement and then renew my request that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Resolution 69, submitted by me May 16 (calendar day of May 23), 1929, establishing the Senate Mississippi engineering advisory board.

There has been a great deal of criticism of the so-called Jadwin plan for caring for the Mississippi flood situation. I have a letter from the American Engineering Council, representing 57,600 engineer members, in which they said:

Since the Mississippi flood of 1927 the American Engineering Council, through an able committee, has carefully studied the entire situation. Reports of this committee were published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 22. In the last report of the committee, dated May 20, 1929, there are these statements:

"First. Your committee now reiterates that sufficient study of the engineering and economic phases of flood control on the Mississippi River has not been made to justify the Federal Government in adopting any plan therefor. * * *

"Second. Your committee believes that the intent of Congress and the best interests of the Nation were defeated by the constitution and action of the board created to adjust the differences of the Jadwin and Mississippi River Commission plans. * * *

"Third. Your committee earnestly recommends the creation by the Federal Government of a board of review composed of nonpartisan and competent civilian engineers with authority to develop the best possible solution of the Mississippi flood-control problem."

The report from which the above quotations were taken was formally approved by the administrative board of American Engineering Council, in session in Washington May 24, 1929.

Senate Resolution 69 has been carefully studied by the members of the executive committee of American Engineering Council, which committee has instructed me to advise you that it is in favor of the establishment of the Senate Mississippi engineering advisory board. This indorsement, however, does not commit the council to any particular plan. We have not indorsed any plan, but have strongly urged a most comprehensive and thorough study by an impartial and competent board of all possible solutions of this great national engineering problem.

We believe a board constituted as proposed in Senate Resolution 69 would insure such a study; hence we hope the resolution will be favorably acted upon by the Senate during the special session of Congress.

That letter is signed by the executive secretary of the Engineering Council, which represents 57,600 members. President Hoover himself was president of that organization a few years ago.

I also have a copy of a letter written to Mr. Budd, president Great Northern Railway, from John F. Stevens, of New York City, one of the outstanding engineers of the United States, one who was probably more largely responsible for the Panama Canal project than anyone else, in which he said:

I spent two months in Washington during the session of the last Congress, which enacted the flood legislation, under which authority work along the Mississippi River is now proceeding. How that Congress could have enacted such legislation is incomprehensible. It was plainly shown that after 50 years of playing with that mighty stream neither the Mississippi River Commission nor any other body or individual had secured the necessary data upon which any intelligent, comprehensive plan to curb its floods or to turn its vast potential power to the use and benefit of our people could be formulated.

In conclusion, I believe that the whole matter of the control of the Mississippi River is still an open question and live issue. It is one that affects the people of the whole Nation, and more especially the members of the engineering fraternity, whose reputation and standing is at stake. How and by whom the matter shall be opened up is a question which should be decided and acted upon with as little delay as possible.

The Evening Star of June 17 carried an Associated Press report from Shreveport, La., headed—

Wins point in fight to halt flood plan. Louisiana landowner gets writ temporarily restraining United States levee program.

The Federal court was asked for a restraining order and has directed the Government and other defendants in charge of the carrying out of the Jadwin plan to show cause why restraining order should not be issued and to appear before the court and give their reasons on the 15th of July.

I have an article by Frederic William Wile, which was evidently written after an interview with President Hoover on the proposition, in which he said:

[From the Evening Star, of June 11, 1929]

HOOVER IS FACING VEXING PROBLEMS—FARM RELIEF AND TARIFF ISSUES TO BE FOLLOWED BY FLOOD CONTROL

No sooner will President Hoover have Congress, farm relief, and tariff revision "off his hands" in the fall than another vexatious situation—Mississippi flood control—will clamor for solution. Present plans call for his giving it prompt consideration. Mr. Hoover's visit to Cincinnati in the fall is prospectively to be followed by a trip of inspection down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. Then, after the President's return to the White House, he expects to come directly and definitely to grips with the flood-control problem. Broadly, Mr. Hoover will have to choose between the rival plans of the Army engineers and those of his own profession, the civilian engineers.

In his farewell campaign speech at St. Louis on the eve of election last November Mr. Hoover included inland waterways and flood control in "the first of the fields" requiring constructive Government leadership. He did not indicate a preference for any particular plan of Mississippi flood control, contenting himself with stating that "I am for its completion at the earliest moment."

JADWIN PROJECT NOW UNDER WAY

Under the so-called Jadwin plan, authorized by Congress on May 15, 1928, the Army engineers are proceeding with the various elements of this project. On June 2, 1928, Secretary of War Davis allotted $21,228,000 of the $24,000,000 available under the flood control act in the year 1928–29 for this work. Studies have been made for the great spillway at Bonnet Carre, and bids have been opened and are being considered for the Birds Point, Mo., to New Madrid, Mo., floodway; the side levees at the Bonnet Carre spillway site and some sections of levee heightening and strengthening on the lower river.

The storms of protest which reached Capitol Hill from the Mississippi Valley resulted in a request by a special committee of valley Senators and Representatives that the President should reopen and reconsider this project. Review is desired especially as to whether or not the Federal Government is to pay for property rights. If so, then a comparison of the engineering differences between the Jadwin and Mississippi River Commission plans is suggested.

LEGAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED

Soon after the President received this request he announced that he had asked the Attorney General and the Secretary of War to report on the legal questions involved in the interpretation of the flood control act. An almost immediate "come back" is the report that the Secretary of War has held up the awarding of the contract for the Birds Point to New Madrid, Mo., floodway. The office of the Chief of Engineers reports that this contract will probably not be awarded until the latter part of July or the 1st of August.

Out of all this turmoil comes the official voice of the engineering profession through the American Engineering Council, requesting President Hoover—the first president of the council—to take steps for the appointment of a board of review, to be composed of nonpartisan and competent engineers, with authority to develop the best possible solution of the flood-control problem. From Mr. Hoover's first-hand knowledge of flood conditions during the summer of 1927, while in charge of flood relief in the lower valley, and his special interest in the Mississippi River system in connection with inland waterways, it is considered more than probable that he will appreciate the viewpoint of those who are clamoring for reconsideration of this great national problem.

The people of the valley, the engineering profession, and others are urging that before the carrying out of the Jadwin plan a comprehensive survey be made to get the necessary basic data—not now available and required for a proper plan. With these facts as a foundation, they propose a project that will consider the entire Mississippi Basin, and provide for the permanent control, conservation, and utilization of its waters. In such a plan, they say, the policy of "working with nature" should be followed, and every practicable natural resource be utilized, especially to keep flood stages low, to eliminate flood crests, and to preclude levee failures and their resulting disasters.

It will be up to President Hoover to decide between these two schools of thought. One is that of the Army engineers, who have traditionally followed the method of restricting and combating the flood waters with levees—the method of attempting "to oppose an irresistible force with an immovable object." The other plan is that of the civilians who "work with nature" and utilize natural forces to control and conserve the excess waters for beneficial use and not permitting them to accumulate their destructive forces at any one place.

The Army engineers in the Jadwin plan utilize the spillway idea. The civilian engineers believe levees can and should be used within practicable limitations to form a flood channel, but that this method of flood control must be supplemented by such other methods as may be found economically feasible in any comprehensive permanent plan. Among these are detention reservoirs on the tributaries, diversion channels to relieve the main river channels, and spillways at such points as will relieve the lower section of the main river at high flood stages, preventing levee failures, resultant loss of life and property damages.

I have a number of articles and editorials from a number of prominent papers criticizing the Jadwin plan and criticizing the Congress for not enacting legislation to take care of the situation.

When I introduced the resolution, which is an ordinary Senate resolution, I understood it to be the practice that it need not be referred to any committee. I asked that the resolution be laid on the table at first, and then, inasmuch as it was carrying an appropriation, I asked that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The whole matter has been thoroughly discussed. There is no question but that a great majority of the engineers of the United States are in favor of a committee studying the situation. I believe such an investigation should be had. I am perfectly willing to strike out that part of the resolution providing for an appropriation. I am satisfied that a committee of civilian engineers can be appointed who will gladly, without pay, make an investigation and report at least against the Jadwin plan. Of course, if they are going to make a full investigation it will probably take some time and money, and an appropriation would have to be made. But I am satisfied that without any pay a committee of the most eminent engineers of the United States, like John F. Stephens and others I might name, will report against the Jadwin plan and ask for a reconsideration by the Congress.

Therefore, Mr. President, I again ask unanimous consent for the laying aside of the unfinished business and the discharge of the committee on the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I regret very much to object to any proposition in which the Senator from North Dakota is interested. This is a matter of tremendous importance and one that we could not possibly deal with now, but which should have the most careful consideration by the committee having jurisdiction of the matter. Furthermore, I gather from one of the extracts which the Senator presented that the President himself is looking into the situation, that he has had a large delegation to see him about it. He is an eminent engineer and his judgment would be worth more than that of almost anybody I know of in the country. Therefore I must object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that President Hoover is an eminent engineer, but, of course, he is a mining engineer, and not a flood-control engineer.

I want to say in reply to the Senator from Washington, however, that after hearings were held for some time during the last Congress on this flood-control measure by his committee and the committee of the House, the House committee, headed by Congressman HULL, repudiated in no uncertain terms and language the Jadwin plan. The Senate committee, however, or a majority of it, indorsed the Jadwin plan, apparently. It came before the Senate and was up for discussion. It was debated for a short time; as I recall, about an hour. I know there were a number of Senators who wanted to speak against the proposed Army plan; but during the lunch hour, about 1 o'clock or between 1 and 2, the first thing we knew the bells rang for a vote on the measure, and the measure was voted on with only about an hour's debate on the floor of the Senate; and the Senator from Washington was the man who called for a vote, as I understand it.

Mr. JONES. There was nearly two hours' debate, and so far as I ever knew no one desired to speak on the measure.

Mr. FRAZIER. O Mr. President, I happen to know there were a number of Senators who wanted to debate it. It was an important measure, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, the greatest engineering project, I suppose, that has ever been before the United States Senate, greater than the Panama Canal.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the Senator may have known of others who desired to speak, but I had not been advised of anyone desiring to discuss the matter. If I had had knowledge of anyone else desiring to speak I would gladly, of course, have seen that they had the opportunity to do so. I would not take advantage of anybody in that way; and had I known anyone had desired to speak on it, I certainly would not have asked for a vote.

Mr. FRAZIER. It seems to me very strange that only one Member of the Senate should speak on a proposition and then a vote be taken before a quorum call was asked for when there were only about a dozen Members of the Senate in the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. Oh, we had more than a dozen on the floor, and anybody could have called a quorum if they so desired.

Mr. FRAZIER. However, I want to say that the fight on this proposition will continue. It has been intimated that even President Hoover is not satisfied with the Jadwin or Army plan. I am glad he is going to make further investigations. I think, however, it is a grave mistake not to have a committee of civilian engineers make the investigation during the recess this summer so they might report back to the Senate when we convene again in August. Of course, if that is not the wish of the Members of the Senate it is all well and good. I want to serve notice that the fight will be kept up for a commission of civil engineers to take up the flood-control question and make a thorough investigation.

THE MOONEY CASE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Bowbells Tribune, a North Dakota paper, dealing with the Mooney case.

There being no objection the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Bowbells Tribune of North Dakota, June 14, 1929]

SET MOONEY AND BILLINGS FREE

On another page of this issue we print a story taken from The Nation of last January. You ought to read it. You ought to read it with care, and deliberate upon the subject explained in this article. It is high time that what was originally a miscarriage of justice be amended, and that what has become, since full details of the case have been exposed and the complete innocence of the two men proved, a rank injustice, be made as nearly right as speedy liberation of the two men can make it.

A story like that of Mooney and Billings, woven into fiction, would make most readers say the story is too fantastic; such things can't possibly happen in America, the land of the free, the one country in the world where the oppressed have an opportunity, where injustice is not tolerated. Yet it has been known for a long time that the two men were not guilty of the crime for which they were sent to the penitentiary and for which one of them would have been hanged had President Wilson not interfered in November, 1918.

Things that do not concern them intimately leave most people cold, which is perhaps as it should be. But this matter of injustice does concern very intimately all American citizens. Our standing as a civilized nation should concern all of us, and no civilized nation will permit men to suffer confinement in penal institutions when they have been proved innocent.

This matter may appear to many to be of slight moment, but a list of names of the people who are interested in seeing these two men freed will convince you that it is a matter our best citizens, our foremost men and women, people of prominence and attainment in many lines of endeavor, consider of utmost importance to America. Just a few of the names, people known to every reader of this paper, are all we need to print to convince you that this case is of national concern, and not what you might consider a case of a few radicals that don't know anything about American ideals anyhow. Scanning the list we see among the members of the committee Clarence Darrow, Mr. Glenn Frank, Editor Norman Hapgood, Authors Sinclair Lewis and Miss Fannie Hurst, Philip La Follette (brother of the United States Senator from Wisconsin), Editor H. L. Mencken of the American Mercury, Editor Fremont Older of the San Francisco Call, Rabbi Stephen Wise, most prominent of Jewish leaders, and a number of other men and women well known in business, professional, and educational circles, men and women to whom American ideals are more than just an idle boast, to whom justice is a matter of great concern.

Governor Young of California has it in his hands to set free these two men. He ought to do it at once.

Read the article in this issue. Then sit down and write a letter to Gov. C. C. Young, Sacramento, Calif., and ask him to take immediate action, to use the power his State's citizens have conferred upon him, to erase the stigma of continued injustice from the name of the fair State of California. Set Mooney and Billings free!

THE INDIAN SITUATION

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by the American Indian Defense Association on the Indian situation.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN INDIAN DEFENSE ASSOCIATION (INC.),
Washington, D. C., June 3, 1929.

Hon. LYNN J. FRAZIER,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR FRAZIER: Every so often a classic on behalf of the hoary system of Indian affairs is achieved. This season's classic has been provided by Dean John H. Wigmore, of the Northwestern University Law School. Its publication postdates March 4 by two months, and is flung into the face of the new administration. The new administration has a new Secretary of the Interior, a new Commissioner, and new Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Each of these new men is a revolutionary type from the standpoint of the Indian Bureau old guard. Dean Wigmore constitutes himself a spokesman for the old guard, and the very rhythm of speech and color of words of the now silenced Burke-Meritt propaganda possesses his tongue.

Chester Rowell, no friend of Indian Bureau misdeeds or misdoers, states that Dean Wigmore is "the most eminent legal scholar of the Middle West." Dean Wigmore's Indian classic is printed as the leading signed editorial in the current Illinois Law Revew, and by surface intent is an attack upon Congress. It climaxes in a trumpet blast, "What this country now needs is a constitutional Mussolini." Which means, apparently, from the dean's context, "What this country needs is to be put under an Indian Bureau officered and conducted as that bureau was before March 4, 1929."

Dean Wigmore is not a humorist or satirist. He has the deadly earnestness of one proceeding from a compulsion located outside himself or from a compulsive idea. He is oracular, and he has put in brief limits the most typical of the audacities, self-contradictions, and provable falsehoods of the (now deceased) official bureau propaganda. The fight for life on the part of the old Indian Bureau system and of the wrongs vested in it has not ended but has only started. Hence, we quote Dean Wigmore's article in full.

Dean Wigmore speaks "as one having authority." We suggest that, knowingly or not, he has been used. There are certain fundamental documents which Dean Wigmore, to have spoken with knowledge, must have read. We assert, on the basis of internal evidence which will appear, that he had not read them when he wrote his article. If Dean Wigmore should reply that he had read them we should be forced to add (as will appear) that he has knowingly misrepresented. These documents are as follows:

Text of the King resolution for investigating Indian matters, printed hearings (3 vols.) of the Senate investigating committee; Report of the Comptroller General on Indian Moneys, printed appropriation hearings of 1928, text of the Budget Act, Report of Advisors on Indian Irrigation Projects (3 vols., 1928), and Report of the Institute for Government Research.

Dean Wigmore's article follows. We place numbers opposite various parts of it. Our commentary, which is not quoted, follows each numbered portion.

THE FEDERAL SENATE AS A FIFTH WHEEL

"The Federal Senate's mania for committee investigations is well known to the public. Its neglect of its own legislative duties is not so well known. And when the two failings coincide on a given subject, a good text is given for pointing out the senatorial weakness. The more the bar can see of the Federal Senate as a legislative failure, the sooner the bar will wake up to its duty of leading public opinion to a reform.

"But the Senate now has gone a step farther. It starts a smoke screen for its own failure, by charging the Executive with the fault.

"In the present case, the facts summarized are these:

"1. The Senator from Utah last winter secured the passage of a resolution to investigate the mismanagement of Indian wards' property by the Bureau of Indian Affairs."

Incorrect. The King resolution provided by careful language for a comprehensive investigation of "the condition of the Indians in the United States."

"2. The Bureau of Indian Affairs had itself already often publicly pointed out these fraudulent practices, which are due largely to local State control—in particular, to self-seekers in Oklahoma."

False. Nowhere (prior to March 4, 1929) has the Indian Bureau publicly pointed out the mass of fraudulent practices which have been revealed by the Senate investigation. Nor can these practices be due "largely to local State control." There are 17 States with large Indian populations and properties, and there is a partial State control in only one—Oklahoma. And concerning Oklahoma, see infra.

"3. The Indian Bureau itself is without responsibility or blame, and is already doing all it can do, and the fault lies with the Congress's failure to give remedial legislation."

Manifestly, the Indian Bureau is responsible and is to blame; for its authority—a discretion absolute and plenary in a hundred directions, and in most details practically unreviewable by the courts—is unexampled in American Government. See infra.

"4. The Indian Bureau has repeatedly pointed out other needs of Federal legislation to help the Indians, but Congress has failed to take action on these recommendations.

"Thus the Indian Bureau is sought by the Senate to be publicly blamed for the results of the Congress's own inaction.

"Now, let us look at some of the details and 'mark how a plain tale shall put them down.'

"1. On August 2, 1928, a Washington dispatch told of this senatorial proposal. The Indians are being defrauded of valuable oil and gas lands by swindlers who 'have obtained their own appointments as guardians for thousands of incompetent or illiterate Indians, and have proceeded to despoil the estates.' There have been 'numerous complaints of improper and improvident administration of Indian property by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.' For example, responsible companies 'offering bids as high as 15 per cent royalty to the Indian owners of the land appear to have been rejected by the Indian Bureau in many cases in favor of operators who offered only 10 to 12½ per cent royalty,' and these grafters then subleased the lands to responsible persons for 15 per cent royalty, pocketing the difference."

The Indian Bureau has proposed some good legislation which has been enacted by Congress, and much notoriously bad legislation, some of which has been enacted and some of which has been defeated by Congress. See infra.

"5. Such is the Senate tale. It exhibits the usual stage setting—the honest and vigilant Senate preparing to expose the fraud and incompetence of the Executive, and thus to gain popular respect as a bulwark of the people's rights and to strengthen its usurpation of executive power."

An anonymous press dispatch from a date prior to the earliest Senate hearings, which quoted nobody, is, according to Dean Wigmore, "the Senate tale." Has Dean Wigmore, or has he not, read or heard about the printed Senate testimony and the extended Senate debates connected with the Indian investigation?

"Now look at the next paragraph, in which the real facts appear:

"6. The Bureau of Indian Affairs had already publicly pointed out the existence of these same fraudulent practices. In the commissioner's annual report for 1924 (p. 25) it is stated that 'many of these Indians have been overreached by the practice of having guardians appointed for adult restricted Indians declared incompetent in the local [State] courts. Section 6 of the United States act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stats. L. 312), conferring jurisdiction on the probate courts of Oklahoma over the persons and properties of restricted minor allottees should be repealed and the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior restored.' The report referred to complaints 'as to the manner in which the estates of Indians were being handled by guardians and administrators under State jurisdiction'; the Indian Bureau made an investigation and 'legislation was sought with a view of restoring to the Federal Government the complete administration of the estates of these Indians.' However, after hearings before committees of Congress, it was determined 'that a joint congressional committee would make an investigation in Oklahoma to ascertain first hand the facts before considering the proposed legislation.'

"So, then, it seems that the Secretary of the Interior told Congress all about these fraudulent practices in 1924; that the main trouble lay in defective Federal legislation; that Congress wanted to make a committee trip to Oklahoma before acting; and that now, four years later, the committee is finally appointed! And at the same time the senatorial author of the resolution gives to the public the false impression that the Senate is discovering something which the Executive has concealed or neglected, and that the fault lies in the Indian Bureau instead of in the law of Congress itself which has made these practices possible!

"Now, to our third proposition:

"3. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, recognizing the need of watchfulness over these Indian property affairs, has constantly taken measures of protection. We need name two only. In the first place (report of 1922, p. 22) the regulations for approving oil leases provide that the actual selling price of gasoline is to be the basis for computing the royalty due the Indian lessor. And in 1924 (report for 1925, p. 18) the Secretary amended the regulations for leases of tribal Indian lands by requiring that all oil and gas leases on tribal and restricted lands shall be offered at public auction to the highest responsible bidder. In the next place, though the probate courts of Oklahoma had control of Indian estates (by the unfortunate Federal law of 1908 above cited), yet the Indian Commissioner, alive to the situation, some years ago organized under the bureau a staff of probate attorneys (report for 1922, p. 25), who appear gratuitously in the State courts as attorneys for the Indians—a veritable 'legal aid bureau,' in fact. 'They have been the means of preventing much wasteful extravagance by their supervision of probate cases; and by checking reports of guardians, requiring new bonds, and other investigations they have saved thousands of dollars to dependent Indian estates.' In the year 1927 this corps of attorneys (report, p. 25) appeared on behalf of Indians in 2,486 cases, took action in the removal or discharge of 281 guardians, and held more than 14,000 conferences in assisting Indians with legal advice."

There exists in Oklahoma a confusing dual jurisdiction over Indians. Just how the Indian Bureau is through its own acts and in spite of congressional mandate a partner in the wrongs done by local Oklahoma guardians is stated by the Comptroller General, quoted below. Neither Dean Wigmore, nor the unknown party who may be using Dean Wigmore, can point to remedial legislation drafted in any recent year by or for the Indian Bureau, designed to terminate the dual guardianship. Meanwhile Oklahoma scandals like the Jackson Barnett scandal and the Quapaw leasing scandal are strictly Federal and are unconnected with dual guardianship. Dean Wigmore here renews, belatedly, a previous smoke screen thinned to invisibility by the glaring facts in the third volume of the Senate hearings and in the Comptroller General's report, not to mention the Judge Knox Federal court decision which even a crier-up of Mussolini might attend to. Incidentally at this point Dean Wigmore makes the quaint statement that the Senate Indian investigation is the outcome of talk about a congressional joint committee to investigate Oklahoma, which he quotes from an Indian Bureau report of 1924.

"7. So that this wonderful discovery of the Senator as to the 'improper and improvident administration of Indian property by the Bureau of Indian Affairs,' is a mare's nest, and a libel, too. For it is the bureau itself that has been striving single handed to protect the Indian from losses caused by the Congress's own improvident legislation of 1908."

We now come to one of the gravest indictments against the Indian Bureau under Commissioners Burke and Meritt. That is the relationship of the Indian Bureau to those guardians over Indian persons who are named by the Oklahoma county courts. Dean Wigmore, uncritically quoting the Indian Bureau as of the year 1922 and again of the year 1927, actually puts forward the indictment as a high praise. Who can have worked upon the dean of a prominent law school in this matter?

The Comptroller General reports clearly on this subject. (S. Doc. 263, 70th Cong., 2d sess.) (a) Every application by a local guardian for funds for his Indian ward "requires the approval of the Indian Bureau superintendent." * * * "The records of the agency show * * * the amount of money requested, the reason why needed, etc." In other words, the Indian Bureau is an uncompelled party to every major depredation by a local guardian. And (b) as for those Indian Bureau probate attorneys, employees of the bureau, responsible to it alone: "The original procedure for field representatives (now probate attorneys) as set forth in the act of 1908, still obtains and should govern the activities of the (Indian Bureau) probate attorneys. It would appear, however, that there is a lack of initiative and aggressiveness in the present activities of these officials. * * * An attempt was formerly made (i. e., in the Franklin K. Lane administration) by the probate attorneys to keep a check on reports made by the guardians. * * * It is now an exception when the supervising probate attorney can show from his office records the current condition of any case in his district, etc." (p. 105, forward, Comp. Gen. Rept.) Ho, for a constitutional Mussolini, Dean Wigmore! The Comptroller General has joined the United States Senate in creating, to the hurt of the Indian Bureau, "a mare's nest, and a libel, too." These are your, Dean Wigmore, words.

"8. Is corroboration needed? It is found in the indorsement of disinterested citizens who are friends of the Indian. In 1923 the Board of the American Baptist Home Missionary Society passed this resolution:

"'We recommend in the most unqualified terms the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and his chief assistants for their deep and active interest in Indian welfare, * * * for their persistent efforts to save the Indians from exploitations by unprincipled men, and for their unfailing courage in antagonizing powerful interests in their effort to protect and help the wronged and helpless.'"

"Is corroboration needed?" Dean Wigmore, to answer his question, resurrects a passage which the American Baptist Home Mission Society probably would like to have forgotten. It is an unlimited "boost" of Commissioner Burke, furnished by the officers of the society, coinciding with the beginning of those operations which transferred $550,000 of Jackson Barnett's money to the society. That $550,000 has been recovered for the aged Indian through the Federal court decision of Judge Knox; but in addition, as the Comptroller General now reveals (p. 107), $485,000 in securities from other ward Indians were transferred to the society between 1920 and 1924, all with the signature of the Indian Commissioner; and "the amount of these bonds was not carried in the balance of the official account of the disbursing agent." The American Baptist Home Mission Society makes excellent human use of its donations, but as a disinterested witness with respect to the Indian Bureau in 1923 the society must be held disqualified.

"And in 1924 (the commissioner being the same man throughout) the advisory council on Indian affairs, a body of representative citizens organized in 1923, coming from all sections, and including Indians, commended the commissioner and his associates for 'rendering great service in protecting and promoting the interests of the Indians within the limits of their authority.'

"4. And now, while messieurs the Senators are entertaining a proposal to earn popular credit by throwing mud at a competent and faithful branch of the Executive, what is their own record for competence and faithfulness in this very field?

"Nothing! It is the same old story, viz, remedial legislation urgently asked by the Executive, but no action taken by Congress.

"9. Here are some of the items, culled from the recent annual reports of the Indian Bureau, and reciting the bureau's requests for legislative remedy:

"1922. Purchase of Indian supplies. 'Legislation is needed to enable the service to handle funds so as to accept all discounts. * * * The repeal or modification of United States Revised Statutes, section 3704ff, is desired, in order that the service may contract for its supplies in simpler form.' Nothing done.

"1923. Narcotic drugs. 'The peyote drug is undermining the health of the Indians; its peddling should be forbidden. Three States passed laws in 1922, making seven in all. Congress also should act.' Nothing done. Pueblo land titles. 'Legislation is necessary to settle satisfactorily controversies affecting Pueblo land titles.' Nothing done.

"1925, 1926. Indian crimes. For many offenses 'Indians are as a rule exempt from punishment by reason of the provisions of United States Revised Statutes, sections 2145, 2146. * * * United States Penal Code, sections 328 and 329, should be enlarged to provide for most cases of crime or offenses committed by Indians within Indian reservations.' 'Legislation in one form or another has been recommended by this office for a number of years. * * * It is hoped that some improvement in the existing law may be secured during the next session of Congress, as it is a most difficult matter to maintain law and order among Indians under present conditions.' Nothing done.

"1926. Marriage and divorce. Indians 'should now be required to comply with the laws governing marriage.' 'Legislation to effect these ends has been introduced in Congress.' Nothing done. Pension of Indian scouts. Owing to difficulty of identifying names, many Indians who volunteered in the World War and were entitled to pensions, and many old Indian scouts who rendered valuable service, lack pensions for need of enabling legislation. 'It is hoped that this condition will soon be remedied by enactment of legislation.' Nothing done. Irrigation lands. 'It is desirable that a lien be created against lands under all the Indian irrigation projects to assure repayment of the expenditures.' Nothing done.

"1927. Taxation. State taxation, allowed under United States Statutes of 1910 and 1916, 'has caused hardship and embarrassment to the Indian allottees affected. * * * The situation is such as to indicate the necessity for remedial legislation.' Nothing done.

"Is not this a shameful record for the Congress? Year after year the executive department recommends simple measures of legislation to remedy hardships and evil conditions. Year after year Congress does nothing. And now the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs publicly proceeds to investigate the alleged shortcomings of this same executive department!

THE SEQUEL

"So much for the gesture itself—the senatorial resolution.

"But what was the sequel? The Senate subcommittee proceeded to tour the Western States during November, holding hearings, inviting complaints, and then misusing the press, en route and ex parte, to spread defamatory blame on the Indian Bureau."

Embarking on legislative history (in order to indict Congress) Dean Wigmore exhibits recklessness. "Nothing done," he says, with respect to Pueblo land titles. Actually the needed legislation was enacted in 1924 and the Pueblo lands board is two-thirds done with its labors. "It is desirable that a lien be created against lands under all Indian irrigation projects. Nothing done." The man is abysmally ignorant. Liens and drafts against tribal funds to the sum of more than $31,000,000 have been thus created through 1924, and their creation goes steadily forward. (P. 800, Hearings of the House Appropriation Committee for fiscal year 1926; Report of Advisors on Indian Irrigation Projects to the Secretary of the Interior, June, 1928.) "Peyote. Nothing done." Aside from divergencies of opinion on Peyote, Dean Wigmore evidently does not know that the Committee of 100 which he quotes as an authority recommended a technical investigation before legislation should be sought; that Secretary Hubert Work joined in the recommendation; that it was transmitted to the National Research Council; that meantime the Indian Bureau has pressed no legislation on this subject. "Indian crimes. Nothing done." The Indian Bureau drafted and pushed a notorious measure in 1926 making its local superintendents into "Mussolinis" indeed, with authority to arrest, try, fine, and imprison Indians without record, without attorneys, without even a printed code of offenses to guide them. (See printed hearings on H. R. 7826.) Congress refused to enact this bureau bill. The La Follette-Frear bill (1926) sought to extend Federal court jurisdiction to Indians, with due process of law in civil and criminal matters; the Indian Bureau opposed and blocked this bill. The bureau's opposition was furtive but effectual—it jerked the patronage wires in the House, and publicly urged that due process of law for Indians would be expensive. That is the sum total of practical record since 1921.

But enough of these cases. Dean Wigmore appears totally ignorant.

"10.—1. Now, in the first place, this November tour was a mere superfluous junket. Why? Because already last year all the facts were fully placed before the Senate in a printed report by a disinterested competent research committee. On February 21, 1928, was handed to the Secretary of the Interior an 872-page volume, entitled 'The Problem of Indian Administration,' prepared by that admirable Institute for Government Research (Brookings, Moulton, and Delano, the chief officers), which has already published some 20 such reports. This report was composed by nine specialists, chaired by Lewis Meriam, and was prepared at the request of the Secretary of the Interior himself. It covers the whole ground of Indian administration, makes numerous recommendations, and contains absolutely all the facts that the Congress could need for intelligent legislation.

"Thus the Senate subcommittee's tour to take evidence was simply a wasteful junket. Its only tangible utility could be to stir up public sentiment against the Executive. And see how it was used to do this:

"2. During November dispatches appeared in the New York Times from place to place on the Senate junket tour, telling of some of the bad conditions of Indian administration, and always linking them with the Indian Bureau as the source. Here are some of the headlines and catchwords in those dispatches: 'Cruelty to Indians by Government agents' (November 23); 'Bureaucrats consume the Indians' money, Senator King declared' (November 29); 'Indian Bureau murders its wards' (December 14).

"Thus the Senate subcommittee published its smoke screen of defamation against the Indian Bureau. All the facts were already contained and printed in the institute report. What the subcommittee did by its tour was merely to give license to all the cranks, chronic grumblers, selfish intriguers, and local disgruntled ones to air their biases and grievances. These had already been sifted and soberly measured by the experts of the institute. But they were now used for purposes of a defamatory smoke screen in the press. Back of it all seems to be an effort by Oklahoma self-seekers to persuade Congress to give that State full legal power to exploit the Indians, untrammeled by the Federal bureau.

"3. Now, the mean part of the defamation is that the Indian Bureau can not defend itself by showing the facts and the true place of the blame."

Dean Wigmore finds that the Senate investigation has been a "superfluous junket. Why? Because already last year all the facts were fully placed before the Senate, etc.," i. e. the report of the Institute for Government Research contains "absolutely all the facts that Congress could need." Again and again: "All the facts." The Institute for Government Research will not prize the compliment. It expressly disclaims any such doubtful eminence. And so far from being either exhaustive or comprehensive is that admirable report, that the Senate hearings, now rolled up into three volumes with more coming, duplicate it at not one point. The Comptroller General's report (a separate document) duplicates the institute's report in no detail. The 3-volume Report of Advisors on Irrigation Projects, 1928, duplicates the institute report in no item. However, it already will have become apparent that Dean Wigmore must have left to some one else the reading of these several documents.

At this point Dean Wigmore reveals the motive of the Indian welfare movement which at long last has shaken the foundations of the Indian Bureau prison house. Dean Wigmore knows what inspires Senators LA FOLLETTE and FRAZIER, WHEELER, DILL, JONES, WALSH, PINE, NORRIS, and KING, Vice President CURTIS, Representatives KELLY and FREAR, the American Red Cross and the American Indian Defense Association and (he evidently does not know) the Institute for Government Research. Presumably the new Secretary of the Interior and the new Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs are similarly inspired. "Back of it all seems to be an effort by Oklahoma self-seekers to persuade Congress to give that State full legal power to exploit the Indians, untrammeled by the Federal bureau." Commissioner Burke's "dastardly conspiracy," alleged by Burke (as Burke under oath confessed) "for publicity. I didn't want to be the only one in the picture!" Such is Dean Wigmore's contribution to the psychology or politics of the Indian question.

"11. That place is Congress, which has failed to appropriate the needed sums repeatedly asked for by the Indian Bureau. And under the new Budget system the bureaus can submit to Congress only the reduced estimates approved by the Budget Director, and the Indian Bureau officials are forbidden to mention the original estimates prepared by them for the Budget Director, which naturally places them in a position of apparent indifference to the necessities of the Indian Service. Now, this true place of blame—the failure of Congress to grant money enough—is amply proved by this impartial institute report above mentioned. Here are a few short passages:

"'The Indian Service is traditionally a starved service. * * * The survey staff estimates roughly that it would take almost twice the present appropriations for the Indian Service if each of its major activities were brought abreast of the better, if not the best, practice of other organizations doing like work. * * * Their administrative task is to do the best with such funds as they are able to secure. * * * In justice to various devoted and able officers and employees of the Indian Office, it should be said that it would be difficult to improve the service much beyond its present conditions without a more nearly sufficient budget.'

"And yet with those words staring the Senate in the face in February, 1928, it adjourned in March without granting the needful appropriations, but with passing a resolution to start a smoke screen against its own shocking failure of duty."

"Congress, which has failed to appropriate the needed sums repeatedly asked for by the Indian Bureau." That is simply false, nor has anyone yet alleged it with specification. And then, in direct contradiction to his first statement: "Under the new Budget system * * * the Indian Bureau officials are forbidden to mention the original estimates prepared by them for the Budget Director." The "new Budget system" has operated across practically the whole of ex-Commissioner Burke's régime. Congress, says Dean Wigmore, is alone to blame; it has not voted money which the bureau has not asked; Congress is to blame, although the bureau is forbidden to tell it what it has told the Budget Director it needs. Into the above medley of contradictions enters the fact that the bureau actually has made public the amounts which it has requested from the Budget Director, and these facts have been broadcasted through numerous mediums, official and unofficial.

We do not again recite that record, so often given before, which proves that the starvation of the Indian Service is chiefly and directly a result of bureau, not congressional, policy. (For example, ex-Assistant Commissioner Meritt's recommendation to the House of Representatives that the appropriations for Indians be reduced $750,000 each year beginning 1921.) We are here concerned only with the evident fact that Dean Wigmore is ignorant on a subject which he discusses ex cathedra and is even unaware of his self-contradictions.

"4. Now just take a single concrete example of the way in which the blame is wrongfully shifted. At Atlantic City on December 14, 1928, at a meeting of the Indian Rights Association, a doctor from New Haven 'described the unsanitary and unhygienic conditions and the lack of enough food, clothing, and shelter which causes disease among the Indians.' Now, in October, 1928, the division of Indian welfare of the National Federation of Women's Clubs had published a bulletin summarizing the above-cited institute report of February, and at page 6 it points out: 'In view of the fact that no extra funds for food will be available under existing circumstances before next summer (1929), the division chairman has recommended that there be included in the Indian Service estimates for 1929-30 a special appropriation for the purchase of dairy herds. * * * The Indian Bureau is making every effort toward providing a quart of milk daily to each Indian school child.' So that the Indian Bureau was doing its best to provide food but Congress had not granted money enough! And the institute report shows that the whole pitiful record of preventable starvation and disease is to be blamed primarily on lack of adequate congressional appropriations. These appropriations the bureau has asked for, but is not allowed to say so, much less to secure them.

"Such are the shameful facts about this Senate smoke screen.

"5. Leaving aside the hyprocritical effrontery and mean libel of this senatorial gesture, let us dwell simply on the Congress's own failures to do its own legislative duty.

"Is it not plain that in these above-cited measures of proposed remedial legislation the Congress has been merely a fifth wheel? In other words, the Secretary himself, had he the power to act by departmental regulation, could have and would have acted promptly and effected the remedies by an amending regulation. The congressional organ was a mere obstruction to legislative efficiency.

"In short, in the unhealthy condition into which the Congress has allowed itself gradually to fall, we do not need it! This Nation is mostly governed by its executive and its judiciary, anyway; and they could just as well do all the governing, if we would let them. The legislative department is now merely an element of political constipation.

"Let the Congressmen meet, and talk, and investigate, and censorize, and intrigue, if they want to. But why depend upon them to legislate?

"What this country now needs is a constitutional Mussolini. Does anybody see one emerging anywhere?

"JOHN H. WIGMORE."

We conclude with—

"So that the Indian Bureau was doing its best to provide food but Congress had not granted money enough!" Dean Wigmore's proof on this subject is a quotation from a clubwoman that "The Indian Bureau is making every effort toward providing a quart of milk daily to each school child." This lady's (unsupported) statement had been made in October, 1928. On November 19, 1928, Commissioner Burke appeared before the House Appropriations Committee, denounced as a falsehood the finding of the Institute for Government Research that school children were being fed on a purchased ration of 11 cents a day, and assured the committee that the children were well nourished. And not merely is all the above contained in printed hearings (which evidently Dean Wigmore has never read), but it was sent out by the Associated Press, and reported in numerous magazine articles.

"Such," concludes the judicially minded Dean, "are the shameful facts about this Senate smoke screen. * * * The hypocritical effrontery and mean libel of this senatorial gesture. * * * What this country now needs is a constitutional Mussolini. Does anybody see one emerging anywhere?" (Dean Wigmore's signed editorial in the Illinois Law Review.)

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. We passed an amendment to the Blease bill, but it seems to me there is some ambiguity in it. In line 12 it speaks about any alien arrested and deported before March 4, 1929. I assume that to mean any alien arrested before March 4, 1929, or arrested and deported before March 4, 1929?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I think the construction will be maintained that the Senator has suggested, that it means "and/or."

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) to create a joint congressional committee relating to the reorganization and concentration of the agencies connected with prohibition enforcement.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, the adjournment being under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, until Monday, August 19, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Wednesday, June 19, 1929) adjourned until Monday, August 19, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, June 19, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God, be merciful unto us and bless us, according to the rich promises of Thy holy word. With stout hearts, free hands, and open minds do Thou endow us as we onward walk the paths of duty. Stimulate us with that faith that always greets the dawn rather than the setting sun—faith in Thee, in our fellow men, and in the ultimate triumph of all things right. With firmness, with patience, and with kindness may we have courage. Blessed Lord God, be with our Speaker and every Member and officer of this Congress. Dismiss past regrets and future fears, and send them forth on errands of service, happiness, and good will. Give them a restful satisfaction that comes to those who have borne wisely and well their part. Keep and bless the loves of their firesides, for they are a little bit higher and holier than all the rest. Be with every one of us until the final triumph of life is won. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 3966. An act to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government;

H. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Kingdom of Iceland to participate in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing and in connection therewith to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericsson; and

H. J. Res. 109. Joint resolution authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the International Petroleum Exposition at Tulsa, Okla., to begin October 5, 1929.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1537. An act to amend subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law," approved March 4, 1929.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 669) entitled "An act to alter and amend an act entitled 'An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route,' approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes,' approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 16) entitled "Concurrent resolution for an adjournment of the Senate from June 19 to August 19, 1929."

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, the certificate of the election of JOHN W. MOORE from the third Kentucky district has been received and is on file in the Clerk's office, and I ask that he take the oath of office.

Mr. MOORE appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON INTERNAL REVENUE TAXATION

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 710 of the revenue act of 1928, I have the honor to submit a report by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, dated June 8, 1929, signed by myself as chairman.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that during the consideration of the pending tariff bill, on May 24 last, I inserted in the RECORD a tentative statement by the United States Tariff Commission showing the differences between schedules and rates in the present tariff act of 1922 and the bill (H. R. 2667) as reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

Subsequently, on June 6 last, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] inserted a similar statement, also prepared by the United States Tariff Commission, showing comparisons between the schedules and rates in the tariff act of 1922 and the bill (H. R. 2667) as it passed the House. However, the information contained in both of those statements was necessarily tentative and was also in very general terms. I have now a complete and detailed report from the United States Tariff Commission showing comparatively the rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 and in the bill (H. R. 2667) as passed by the House of Representatives, based upon imports for consumption during the calendar year 1928 and arranged according to the schedules and paragraphs in the bill (H. R. 2667).

I will say that copies of this statement have been sent to members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and of the Finance Committee of the Senate, but Mr. Thomas O. Marvin, chairman of the Tariff Commission, advises me that they have no funds for the publishing of the statement, and that it will not be available in any other form except the typewritten form submitted to the two committees.

I therefore ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks upon this general subject; and in so doing, that I may insert these tables, which I think can be printed across a double page of the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. I have no objection to printing the tables in the RECORD, but had not the gentleman better arrange to have it printed as a House document, so that it may be available to all Members of the House?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. GARNER. The Finance Committee of the Senate has the right to print, without going to the Joint Committee on Printing.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the first consent is granted, I shall follow it with a request for unanimous consent to print the statement as a House document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Now Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this report and tables from the United States Tariff Commission which I have described may be printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think it necessary to print it in the RECORD and also as a document?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes. The readers of the RECORD will get the information there and the House document will necessarily be of a limited number, for the use of the Members of the House. I think it is very valuable to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to have this information in the RECORD at once.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. How many readers are there of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD who would see this that would attach any importance to it whatever or make any use of it? It strikes me that it is proper to issue it as a House document, but I doubt the value of it in the RECORD.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am certain that the people who get the RECORD through my allotment will all be interested in this matter, and Members, I think, might make it their business to send the RECORD to persons especially interested in this particular subject. The House document will not be available in sufficient numbers to satisfy all of the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker: In these tables, furnished by the United States Tariff Commission, I call special attention to the first summary, which shows, as to each of the 15 schedules of H. R. 2667, first the amounts of the imports during the year 1928; secondly, the computed duties on those imports under the act of 1922 and under H. R. 2667, as it passed the House; and, thirdly, the actual or computed equivalent ad valorem rates upon the same imports under the act of 1922, and H. R. 2667 as it passed the House. I have myself computed the rate of increase, in each of the schedules, of the actual or computed equivalent ad valorem rates under H. R. 2667, as it passed the House, over the same rates in the act of 1922, and find the rates of increase to be as follows:

Rates of increase

Schedule. Title.	Per cent
1. Chemicals, oils, and paints	10.29
2. Earths, earthenware, and glassware	20.75
3. Metals and manufactures of	12.94
4. Wood and manufactures of	59.25
5. Sugar, molasses, and manufactures of	36.12
6. Tobacco and manufactures of	6.13
7. Agricultural products and provisions	49.51
8. Spirits, wines, and other beverages	22.32
9. Manufactures of cotton	8.25
10. Flax, hemp, jute, and manufactures of	3.52
11. Wool and manufactures of	16.98
12. Manufactures of silk	6.36
13. Manufactures of rayon	.64
14. Papers and books	6.65
15. Sundries	37.50

These figures agree quite substantially with those submitted by the Tariff Commission in its tentative statement appearing in the RECORD for June 6 last, page 2459 (remarks by Mr. BACHARACH, of New Jersey).

The documents above referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, June 18, 1929.

Hon. CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHINDBLOM: There is transmitted herewith a set of 16 tables showing by schedules and paragraphs a comparison of rates of duty under the tariff act of 1922 and the bill H. R. 2667. The summary table shows the totals by schedules, and the succeeding tables cover, respectively, Schedules 1 to 15 by paragraphs. The tables are arranged in the order of the pending House bill.

The tables show import statistics for the calendar year 1928; the calculated amount of duties under the existing law and under the rates provided in the House bill; and the equivalent ad valorem rates of duty under the existing and proposed tariffs.

Copies of these tables are being sent to each member of the Committee on Ways and Means and to each member of the Committee on Finance.

Transfers from the free list of the tariff act of 1922 and the dutiable list in the pending bill, and vice versa, have been taken into consideration in these tabulations. Therefore, the averages of imports and of ad valorem duties for each schedule as a whole, and for the particular paragraphs in which transfers have been made, will not agree with the published statistics for imports in 1928 under the tariff act of 1922. It was necessary to incorporate these transfers in order to have an accurate comparison of the two sets of tariff rates.

At the end of some schedules will be found statistics for certain products for which comparisons could not be made because of the differences in classification in the pending bill as compared with the tariff act of 1922.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS O. MARVIN, Chairman.

Comparative rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 and in the bill H. R. 2667 as passed by the House of Representatives based upon imports for consumption during the calendar year 1928, arranged according to schedules and paragraphs in the bill H. R. 2667

[Compiled by the United States Tariff Commission]

[1] Rates of duty are not shown where more than one rate is involved.

[a] Rate on oxalic acid changed by presidential proclamation from 4 cents to 6 cents per pound, effective Jan. 28, 1925.

[b] Rate on methyl alcohol changed by presidential proclamation from 12 cents to 18 cents per gallon, effective Dec. 27, 1926.

[c] Imports of synthetic gums and resins not included; data not available.

[e] Rate on barium dioxide changed by presidential proclamation from 4 cents to 6 cents per pound, effective June 18, 1924. Rate on barium carbonate, precipitated, changed by presidential proclamation from 1 cent to 1½ cents per pound, effective Apr. 25, 1928.

[f] Rate on diethylbarbituric acid transferred to American selling price, effective Nov. 29, 1924.

[g] Rate on cresylic acid decreased from 40 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents per pound based on American selling price to 20 per cent and 3½ cents, effective Aug. 19, 1927. Same change on phenol, effective Nov. 30, 1927.

[j] Duty free imports of coconuts from the Philippine Islands in 1928 amounted to 290,636,702 pounds, valued at $23,061,357.

[k] The rate and amount of duty indicated under H. R. 2667 is a minimum, owing to the provision that any combination or mixture in this paragraph shall be dutiable at 25 per cent "but not less than the rate applicable to the component material subject to the highest rate of duty."

[l] No imports of London purple in 1928. Paris green transferred to free list under H. R. 2667.

[m] Rate on potassium chlorate increased from 1½ cents to 2¼ cents per pound, effective May 11, 1925, by presidential proclamation. Rate on potassium permanganate changed by presidential proclamation from 4 cents to 6 cents per pound, effective Dec. 16, 1928.

[n] Santonin salts transferred to par. 1751 in H. R. 2667.

[p] 25 per cent under par. 5 to Dec. 4, 1928; thereafter free, by court decision.

[q] Rate on sodium nitrate changed by presidential proclamation from 3 cents to 4½ cents per pound, effective Jan. 5, 1924. Rate on sodium silicofluoride changed by presidential proclamation from 25 per cent of foreign valuation to the same rate based on American selling price, effective Sept. 15, 1928.

Comparative rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 and in the bill H. R. 2667 as passed by the House of Representatives based upon imports for consumption during the calendar year 1928, arranged according to schedules and paragraphs in the bill H. R. 2667—Continued

[2] Import data not segregated.
[3] Imports under par. 1700 are not included; data not available.
[4] Posts transferred to free list under H. R. 2667.
[5] Includes bentwood furniture for which H. R. 2667 provides a rate of 55 per cent ad valorem. As import data are not segregated to show the proportion of bentwood furniture included, duties to show the effect of H. R. 2667 have been computed on the basis of minimum increase—40 per cent ad valorem. This is the rate which will probably apply to the bulk of the imports.
[6] Rate on paintbrush handles changed by presidential proclamation from 33⅓ per cent to 16⅔ per cent ad valorem effective Nov. 13, 1926.

[1] Rates of duty are not shown where more than one rate is involved.

[a] See additional figures, par. 701 at end of schedule.

[b] Rate on fresh milk changed by presidential proclamation from 2½ cents to 3¾ cents per gallon effective June 13, 1929.

[c] Rate on cream changed by presidential proclamation from 20 cents to 30 cents per gallon, effective June 13, 1929.

[d] Rate on butter changed by presidential proclamation from 8 cents to 12 cents per pound, effective Apr. 5, 1926.

[e] Rate on Emmenthaler type Swiss cheese changed by presidential proclamation from 5 cents per pound but not less than 25 per cent ad valorem to 7½ cents per pound but not less than 37½ per cent ad valorem effective July 8, 1927.

[f] Rate on bobwhite quail changed by presidential proclamation from 50 cents to 25 cents each (valued at $5 or less each), effective Nov. 2, 1925.

[g] Rate on whole egg, egg yolk, and egg albumen, frozen or otherwise prepared or preserved and not specially provided for, changed by presidential proclamation from 6 cents to 7½ cents per pound, effective Mar. 22, 1928.

[h] H. R. 2667 provides an increased duty on alimentary pastes containing eggs. As import statistics do not give plain and egg alimentary pastes separately the effect of this rate can not be shown.

[i] Rates of duty changed by presidential proclamation effective Apr. 6, 1924. Wheat from 30 cents to 42 cents per bushel (60 pounds). Flour, Semolina, etc., from 78 cents to $1.04 per 100 pounds.

[j] Rate on mill feeds, bran, etc., changed by presidential proclamation from 15 to 7½ per cent ad valorem, effective Apr. 6, 1924.

[k] Rate on cherries, sulphured or in brine, stemmed or pitted, changed by presidential proclamation from 2 to 3 cents per pound, effective Jan. 2, 1923.

[n] Included with peaches, par. 745.

[o] Not including duty-free imports from Philippine Islands. Duty-free imports of coconut meat, desiccated, shredded, cut, or similarly prepared from the Philippine Islands in 1928 amounted to 46,695,592 pounds, valued at $4,004,620.

[p] Rate on peanuts, not shelled, changed by presidential proclamation from 3 cents to 4½ cents per pound, shelled 4 cents to 6 cents per pound, effective Feb. 18, 1929.

[s] Includes chick-peas or garbanzos transferred from par. 1657 of the act of 1922.

[t] Rate on onions changed by presidential proclamation from 1 cent to 1½ cents per pound, effective Jan. 21, 1929.

[u] Includes broomcorn free under act of 1922 (par. 1538), dutiable under H. R. 2667.

Comparative rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 and in the bill H. R. 2667 as passed by the House of Representatives based upon imports for consumption during the calendar year 1928, arranged according to schedules and paragraphs in the bill H. R. 2667—Continued

[2] When bleached, dyed, or otherwise treated, an additional duty of 2 cents per pound is levied. This additional duty is not included in the computed duty under H. R. 2667.

[3] See figures at end of schedule for other imports of cordage.

[5] If the pile is partly cut, the duty under H. R. 2667 becomes 50 per cent. Data are not available for computing the additional duty under this provision.

[4] Duty-free imports of cordage from the Philippines in 1928 amounted to 5,659,967 pounds, valued at $732,037.

[1] Rates of duty are not shown where more than one rate is involved.
[a] Application of various rates based upon analysis of invoice data.
[b] Includes rayon sewing thread, etc., transferred under H. R. 2667 to par. 1304.
[c] Rayon silk noils were held dutiable as rayon waste under T. D. 41362.
[d] Includes small amounts of cellulose acetate rayon waste transferred under H. R. 2667 to par. 31.
[e] Under H. R. 2667 rayon noils carry a higher duty than waste. As import statistics are not segregated, the effect of this increase can not be shown.
[f] For items for which duties can not be compared see figure for par. 1302 at end of schedule.
[g] Imports not segregated included in "plied rayon yarns" in par. 1301.
[h] Duties can not be compared—see composite total for "sundry imports of rayon and manufactures of" at end of schedule.
[i] Figures given do not cover knit fabrics and knit goods of artificial horsehair, visca, or cellophane, which are included in the composite total for "Sundry imports of rayon and manufactures of" at end of schedule.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I include the following letter to myself under date of June 20, 1929, from Hon. Thomas O. Marvin, chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, and a table showing the approximate total number of rates of duty in H. R. 2667, with the number of proposed increases and decreases and the number of rates not changed, as to each and all of the 15 schedules. It will be observed that the total number of rates is 2,683, of which the number of proposed increases is 916, the number of proposed decreases is 64, and the number not changed is 1703.

The documents referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, June 20, 1929.

Hon. CARL R. CHINDBLOM,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHINDBLOM: Inclosed herewith is a table showing, by schedules, the approximate number of rates of duty in H. R. 2667, the number of increases, the number of decreases, and the number of rates not changed.

The total number of rates in H. R. 2667 is 2,683. The proposed increases number 916 and the decreases 64. The number of rates not changed is 1,703, or nearly twice as many rates not changed as have been changed.

The largest number of changes is in Schedule 7 (agricultural products). For the remaining 14 schedules of the House bill the total increases in rates number 512; the decreases, 49. The average number of increases for these 14 schedules (exclusive of agricultural products) is approximately 36, compared with 404 increases in the agricultural schedule.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS O. MARVIN.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a story on The Trails of Columbus, the author of which is our colleague, Hon. MAURICE H. THATCHER, of Kentucky, which has appeared in the National Republic Magazine.

The SPEAKER. The Commissioner from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an article on The Trails of Columbus, recently published in the National Republic Magazine. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AN IMPORTANT DECISION

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DAVIS, of Tennessee, is unavoidably absent from the House to-day. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to extend his remarks briefly and to incorporate therein a decision recently rendered by the United States District Court at Chicago in a case brought by the Government relative to patents which Judge DAVIS says is peculiarly important in connection with the activities of the Radio Trust, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that his colleague, Mr. DAVIS, may have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, many of us have for years been calling attention to the Radio Trust. The members of this trust have been hiding behind their patents, insisting that patents are legal monopolies. On the other hand, many of us have been insisting that while each patent is a legal monopoly in a sense yet it is just as much a violation of the antitrust statute to combine two or more patents owned by different parties for the purpose of restraining trade, stifling competition, and so forth, as it is to combine two or more unpatented articles for that purpose. The United States district court at Chicago has just rendered a decision on this question in the case of the United States against 52 oil companies, including the Standard Oil Cos. of New Jersey and Indiana, the Texas Co., and the Gasoline Products Co.

The Government charged that the defendants had pooled their patents and had forced independent companies to pay royalties for their use and to restrict trade operations to certain areas, so as not to compete with the defendant companies.

This is exactly what the Radio Trust is doing, and the decision in this case applies directly and peculiarly to the activities of the Radio Trust.

The court in said case held:

"These various agreements step outside the limits of lawful monopolies, which arose from issuance of the patents," the majority opinion said. "The patent monopoly itself is a property right, and agreements in respect thereto must be subject to the same antimonopoly tests as any other property rights * * * in so far as these agreements are license agreements, they are not objectionable. To the extent they go beyond license agreements, they are subject to the inhibitions of the Sherman Act."

Under leave granted to do so, I hereby extend my remarks by inserting the said decision in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES, PETITIONER, v. STANDARD OIL CO. (INDIANA), STANDARD OIL CO. (NEW JERSEY), STANDARD DEVELOPMENT CO., THE TEXAS CO., GASOLINE PRODUCTS CO., STANDARD OIL CO. (NEW YORK), MAGNOLIA PETROLEUM CO., ET AL. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS

Evans, C. J.: Petitioner brought this suit to enjoin alleged violations of sections 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. Defendants are grouped into two classes, one called primary defendants (the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, the Texas Co., the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and Gasoline Products Co.), and the other, described as secondary defendants, included 46 corporations and 1 individual.

Two defendants, Joseph H. Adams and M. W. Kellogg Co., were later made parties defendant. As to Adams, petitioner sought the cancellation of certain patents to him issued because of fraud practiced in their procurement. As to Kellogg Co., it was charged that it was in a conspiracy with the primary defendants to injure competitors who were engaged in licensing producers under processes covered by patents belonging to one Fleming.

All the defendants are engaged in manufacturing, selling, or handling gasoline within the confines of the United States. Petitioner charges an unlawful combination and conspiracy to monopolize interstate trade and commerce in cracked gasoline. This alleged monopoly or illegal restraint of trade exists, so it is alleged, because of certain agreements which deal with the right to use certain patented processes and apparatus.

The primary defendants executed certain so-called cross-license agreements. The secondary defendants thereafter took sublicenses from one or the other of the primary defendants.

It appearing that the time consumed in the taking of evidence would cover months, and the business of the court of appeals not permitting of the withdrawal of three judges for such a period, a reference was had and Attorney Charles Martindale, of Indianapolis, was appointed a special master in chancery to hear the evidence and to make findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon.

The testimony taken was voluminous and its presentation required many months. After a full hearing the master found for defendants. He made findings of fact and conclusions of law (covering 384 printed pages). Petitioner duly excepted, and the questions here presented arise out of such exceptions to the master's report. Space prevents our incorporating in full the exhaustive report of the master. A brief résumé is herewith attempted:

Beginning about 1900 and coincident with the successful development of the internal combustion hydrocarbon engine, there arose in this country a tremendous demand for petroleum as a motive power. Following this demand came improved methods for the separation of gasoline from crude oil. Generally speaking, the effective method of disintegration was through the application of heat. But the demand continued to multiply. This increased demand presented the perplexing problem of increasing the volume of gasoline from a given amount of crude oil. The gasoline consumption which in 1904 was 290,000,000 gallons rose in 1925 to 11,173,806,000 gallons. During the same time the production of crude oil increased only 600 per cent. Increased production of gasoline followed the introduction of distillation processes whereby a larger percentage of gasoline was extracted from crude oil. In 1904 only 2.48 gallons of gasoline were obtained from a barrel of crude oil. In 1925 this amount was increased to 14.63 gallons per barrel.

It is out of the agreements respecting the use of the processes and the apparatus to apply the processes for producing gasoline that the alleged monopoly arises. These processes generally relate to what is known as "pressure cracking." In other words, an increase of heat or prolonged application of heat to the crude oil, or an application of it under pressure increased under certain circumstances the amount of gasoline obtainable from a given quantity of oil. Generally speaking, this separation of the molecules that results from the application of heat to the petroleum distillate is what those skilled in this art call "cracking." Respecting it we quote from the master's report.

"'Cracking' is a very broad term which covers almost any splitting apart or joining together of hydrocarbon molecules. In this record we have to deal only with pyrogenetic 'cracking.' The reactions are extremely complex—so complex that the most learned chemists and physicists are careful to limit and qualify what they know about what takes place in the reactions. Eminent chemists and physicists who know the most about this art are the most modest about what they know. There are still volumes to learn as to why these molecules composed of hydrogen and carbon split in quite unexpected ways. One can not make much generalization in regard to reactions because things which are true for one set of conditions or for one type of oil are not true for some other set of conditions or some other type of oil. Instead of being a simple, well-understood art, this is a highly complex art with a very large field still for exploration and for the revelation of new methods and new compounds.

"The phenomena of behavior of molecules and atoms in petroleum are still mysterious. Molecular behavior when the existing arrangement is broken up can be predicated under certain now known conditions. Given a certain substance derived from petroleum, apply selected factors of degrees of heat, degrees of pressure, and time of reaction, and one may expect a certain result. New molecular arrangements have resulted in new compounds. Given a different substance of a different molecular arrangement and apply the same factors and something different happens. What substance to choose; what factors of heat, pressure, and time to apply; the means to apply them and means for separation of resulting fractionation to get more and better motor fuel, was the extensive field of research and experiment into which the chemist adventurer was to fare forth in the first decade of this century armed with what discoveries in the chemistry and physics relating to the art had been made prior thereto.

"It is conceded that in the cracking of oil there are generally produced by 'cracking' both lighter constituents and heavier constituents, and the attention of the chemist in this art is usually focused merely on the lighter constituents; and also that if cracking is carried to an extent sufficient to make any considerable amount of gasoline, there will be resultant coke and gas.

"The great advancement in the last quarter of a century in the development of steels has made it possible to control pressures so far beyond those which were formerly considered dangerous that the new compounds of high distillation have revolutionized some industries. In this industry, where formerly 75 pounds to the square inch was considered approaching the dangerous pressure, in the Cross process of the defendant Gasoline Products Co., a pressure of 700 to 850 pounds to the square inch is availed of and may even go beyond that point.

"We are dealing here with 'cracking processes' to produce motor fuel employing heat and pressure. A 'cracking process' in this sense is one in which the splitting apart and joining together of the hydrocarbon molecules proceed to an extent sufficient to form products suitable for motor fuel in commercial quantities by temperature, pressure, and sufficient time of reaction under favorable conditions to allow the disrupted and disarranged molecules to form new molecular combinations.

"The art under examination has been classified into four types of pyrogenetic cracking processes, which are—

"First. Bulk distillation at atmospheric pressure, which is characterized by the fact that a large body of oil is held at a cracking temperature for a very long period of time (a matter of hours or days). This would include the class of operation in which cracking takes place in the latter part of the ordinary coking method of running crude oil. This is the method by far the most widely used prior to 1912 and is still very widely used. It is very simple and easy to carry out and produces considerable quantities of kerosene (which was the product most desired from the crude oil prior to the demand for motor fuel). This method of cracking was only applicable to materials which boiled higher than gas oil (well above 700°), because everything in the ordinary gas oil range and lower distilled out before appreciable cracking began to take place. It was only the heavy products which stayed in the still that were cracked to any considerable extent. This method requires hours or days at temperatures generally between 700° and 800° F., and such processes usually run to a coke bottom which is not feasible in bulk pressure distillation. The method produces comparatively little gasoline, together with considerable gas and a large amount of coke.

"Second. Bulk pressure distillation—a very slow distillation. In this method a large body of oil is held at a cracking temperature for a long period of time—a matter of hours and days—but under substantial pressure, and there is distilled out of the system the products somewhere nearly as fast as they are formed, letting the unchanged products stay back for a longer time under cracking conditions. The degree of pressure, of course, correspondingly raise the degree of temperature at which given products can be held liquid, and therefore tends to increase the cracking rate and makes it possible to crack lighter materials than in a still without pressure.

"Third. Tube cracking—which includes a great many of the prior art processes where the oil is passed through a long narrow retort or tube which is heated generally to a bright red heat and the stream of oil is passed through and undergoes progressive evaporation and decomposition. In some cases the oil has been vaporized before it enters the cracking system.

"In this method, while passing through the long tube, the oil gradually vaporizes, but both the liquids and the vapors and both the uncracked and the cracked materials go along together and are subject to cracking for approximately the same length of time.

"Tube-cracking processes, on account of requiring a shorter time, necessitates the use of a higher temperature in order to produce a reasonable amount of cracking, and they characteristically have operated with temperatures considerably above those used in bulk pressure distillation, and have a time of contact that is measured in minutes rather than in hours and days. All such tube-cracking processes have some pressure at the inlet of the coil and in some cases they carry pressure clear through the coil.

"Fourth. Flash or film cracking—in which all the cracking is produced by almost instantaneous contact of oil or oil vapors with a very hot surface. If liquid oil is fed to the apparatus, it is generally dripped or sprayed on the hot surfaces, where it is vaporized and cracked almost simultaneously.

"In this method there is nothing more than a spray or film of liquid oil in the cracking zone and the cracking contact is a matter of seconds or fractions of a second, while the temperatures required are those of red heat of metal or higher. The pressure is usually substantially atmospheric because of the difficulty of building containers which will hold pressure at such temperatures. The hot surfaces employed may be a hot metal retort, or frequently of brick or the like.

"While there are references in the exhibited prior art to flash cracking apparatus and processes, none of the patents here in question involve such methods or apparatus, and such references are not applicable to the patents of the defendants.

"The patents in suit employ either bulk-pressure distillation or tube cracking, and to be applicable the reference must come within these two classifications.

"Bulk distillation at atmospheric pressure has been referred to because it is the method by which is produced what has been referred to in the record as 'straight-run' gasoline."

Each of the primary defendants developed its own processes, and constructed apparatus with which to apply its processes for which it, or its assignors, obtained patents. The Gasoline Products Co. secured or acquired 9 patents; the Texas Co., 29 patents; the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, 23 patents; the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, 15 patents, and the Standard Oil Co. of New York, 1 patent. There are 77 patents involved.

Each primary defendant has given a name to its process. The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana adopted what is called the Burton processes—the Burton shell still and the Burton tube stills with or without bubble power. The Texas Co. adopted what is called the Holmes-Manley process. The Gasoline Products Co. followed the teaching of Cross patents. The Standard Oil of New Jersey followed what is known as the tube and tank process.

The Government contends that these patents were all improvement patents covering minor or trivial advances over the prior art and that each should be given a very narrow construction. It asserts that defendants used them to tie together and reinforce the fences which surrounded their field of monopoly and thereby effectually accomplish what could not and would not have been accomplished by the patentees singly or individually.

To discuss each and every patent involved in the cross-license agreements would cover many pages. The master has gone over those selected by the defendants for attack and has given a careful statement of the processes and apparatus there disclosed. The summary of his study is herewith reproduced.

"The process of the primary defendants, respectively, are the embodiment of the group of patents held by them, respectively, with the exception of a very small number.

"It is very certain that no one could practice the commercial process of either of the primary defendants without running foul of the patents on the indispensable features embodied in it.

"It is quite true that there is a recognizable distinction between the usefulness of the plant structures of the defendants, respectively, considered as mechanical units, and the utility of separate patented features embodied therein, and likewise a distinction between the usefulness of the commercial process included in each of the respective operations of the primary defendants and the utility of the several and respective inventions described in their process patents. While it is abundantly shown that the respective structures of the primary defendants as mechanical units and the processes which are effectuated by these structures are of very great utility in the art, it does not necessarily follow that such utility is due in equal degree to each of the inventions embodied therein. Nevertheless, where it is shown, as it is in this case, that the mechanical units could not exist without the embodiment therein of the patented mechanical features and that the processes effectuated and carried out by these structures could not be carried on without involving claims of the process patents of the several defendants, there is necessarily imported to each of the inventions so embodied in the structure or involved in the process a utility of more or less relative importance.

"Therefore the utility of these commercial processes includes and demonstrates the utility of the patents of the primary defendants, respectively, pertaining thereto. * * *

"The Burton process of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana went into operation in the latter part of 1912, and was the first process for producing cracked gasoline in large quantities.

"In producing this successful commercial process the company had expended in research and experimental work and in the erection of the first battery of pressure still a sum largely in excess of a million dollars. It doubled the amount of gasoline which could be produced from a given amount of crude petroleum.

"The product first produced was of bad color and offensive odor, and was sold as 'motor spirit.' Later this product was refined and sold as ordinary gasoline.

"From 1912 to 1920 the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and its licensees were the only sources in the United States commercially making cracked gasoline, and during that period the demand for gasoline increased a thousand per cent, while the supply of crude petroleum increased only 200 per cent.

"In 1914 the production of cracked gasoline was 2,028,000 barrels.

"In 1921, the production of cracked gasoline was 21,253,000 barrels.

"As the Burton process was the only commercial process producing cracked gasoline from 1914 to 1921, this enormous increase must be largely attributable to the Burton process.

"It is shown by Exhibit No. 2 that Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has received from its licensees, including royalties received from the Texas Co. and Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the following amounts:

1915	332,048.87
1916	1,786,982.62
1917	2,418,627.17
1918	3,154,202.54
1919	3,850,081.66
1920	3,441,925.76
1921	1,990,631.10
1922	4,353,778.07
1923	3,051,857.85
1924	2,414,708.41

"The Texas Co. began the first installation of the Holmes-Manley batteries in July of 1918 and they were put into commercial operation at Port Arthur in February, 1920. * * * From that time to the beginning of the year 1926 the Texas Co. had spent over $14,000,000 for installing plants operating the Holmes-Manley process, exclusive of steam plants, power plants, water supply, and general tankage used in connection with the cracking operation.

"It now has plants at West Tulsa, Lockport, Ill., and Casper, Wyo. The daily rated gasoline production of all these plants is 1,002,000 gallons.

"From 1920 to 1924 it produced 620,022,990 gallons of cracked gasoline.

"It has received for the use of its patents, from its licensees, the following royalties:

1922	943,641.14
1924	986,891.78

"This Holmes-Manley continuous cracking process is almost universally agreed to be the highest embodiment of the art of bulk pressure distillation. Whereas the Burton and Clark and Clark processes enable the operator to handle 20,000 gallons of cracking stock in a cycle of two days (or about 10,000 gallons a day), with the result of obtaining 30 to 35 per cent of gasoline, the Holmes-Manley process puts through approximately 70,000 gallons per day, or seven times as much as the Burton-Clark process, and makes around 40 per cent of gasoline and runs for a period of 15 to 30 days, and frequently longer, before having to be shut down because of coking.

"The Holmes-Manley commercial cracking still embodies in its structure and operation the inventions of a number of the patents of the defendants. A number of its features are disclosed in the various patents to Adams; others are in the patents issued to Manley, to Holmes, to Behimer, and to Holmes and Manley jointly. It embodies also some of the claims of Clark, Humphreys, Burton (1160689), Lewis & Cooke, Burton & Clark (owned by the Standard of Indiana), and some of the claims of Ellis (owned by the New Jersey company).

"The Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey began operating pressure stills under license to use the inventions of the Burton patents of Standard of Indiana in 1915. It began operating its tube and tank stills in 1921.

"From five licenses of its tube and tank process the New Jersey company received the following amounts: In 1922, $1,462.60; in 1923, $161,641.80; in 1924, $356,757.09.

"Using its tube and tank process in 1924 it produced 2,615,932 gallons of cracked gasoline.

"The tube and tank process of the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) was worked out by Mr. Frank A. Howard, in charge of the research work of that company, and Doctor Loomis. It was started by a desire to devise a process of handling the viscous type of Mexican crude oil called 'Panuco crude.' It was while working on these developments that Howard became impressed with the advisability and necessity of the company acquiring the Hall patents and the Ellis patents.

"Many of the cracking units involving this tube and tank process are operated in foreign countries by subsidiaries of the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey).

"The utility of the tube and tank commercial process of the New Jersey company is shown, and, as said above, imports the utility of the patented inventions embodied in its construction. The importance of the industrial operation of the commercial process lends great importance to the patents covering the industrial embodiment.

"The Gasoline Products Co. is not engaged in refining. Its business is limited to the development of a cracking method (the Cross process), owning the Cross patents therefor, issuing licenses thereunder to refiners for operation under that process.

"From all its licensees, from 1921 to 1924, it had received $528,271.28.

"The doctors, Roy Cross and Walter Cross, in developing the Cross process of the Gasoline Products Co., took a distinct step forward in the gasoline refining art and they have gone further than any other of the inventors in the utilization of very high temperatures and very high pressures, which is in line with the general trend of the art of destructive distillation. Their patents are a contribution of great importance to the patent art relating to the refining industry.

"From all the evidence the master finds that the inventions of the patents owned by each of the primary defendants, respectively, are of great utility; that the respective groups of patents owned by the several primary defendants relate to the same art and general subject matter and the domain covered by each group is so adjacent to the domain covered by each of the other groups as that wasteful litigation was likely to be provoked between them and their development of competing refining processes hindered and perhaps frustrated to the detriment of the public interest; that whether and in which instances a patent or patents of one primary defendant was infringed by either of the other primary defendants in the absence of a license it is not now necessary to decide.

"The special master finds that with the exception of not more than five or six, the patents owned by the 'primary defendants' are not for 'minor improvements,' in processes and operations for the manufacture of cracked gasoline, but are for substantial, valuable, and highly useful improvements, which have made possible the manufacture of cracked gasoline in commercial quantities, have increased the yield of gasoline per barrel of crude many times over and have enabled the supply of gasoline to meet the ever-increasing demand.

"That the processes employed by defendants for cracking gasoline by the application of superatmospheric pressure and high temperatures, described in the letters patent of the primary defendants, are not, in all substantial respects, the same processes as those known and employed long prior to the application for, or issuance of any of their said patents, but were for new and useful and patentable inventions, the utility of which has been shown by the petitioner itself.

"The special master finds that the procuring and treating of said patents as valid by the defendants is not a device to lend color of legality to any combination, conspiracy, or monopoly, but that said patents were procured in the regular and lawful manner, and were acquired by the defendants in good faith, for the laudable purpose of producing a larger proportion of gasoline from a given amount of crude petroleum, and for supplying the critical demand in the United States for more gasoline than could be produced by the straight distillation method."

The Government singled out two of the patents (property of Texas Co.) for special attack. It charged that their issuance had been secured through fraud.

The master also found against the petitioner on the issues raised by the supplemental petition wherein defendant M. W. Kellogg Co. and the primary defendants were charged with a conspiracy to increase their monopoly of the cracking processes by injuring a competitor (Fleming) who was engaged in selling licenses under his cracking process patents.

The questions presented by petitioner's exceptions to the report are: (1) Does the evidence support (a) the master's findings as to the Adams patents and (b) the master's findings respecting the conduct of M. W. Kellogg Co. and the four primary defendants? (2) May petitioner in this suit question the validity or the scope of the patents which it issued? (3) If the preceding question be answered in the affirmative, are the patents valid? (4) Do the agreements of which petitioner complains violate section 1 or 2 of the antitrust act?

(1) The Adams patent. Petitioner attacks two patents upon the ground that they were obtained by fraud. To support its contention, petitioner produced a witness, B, who testified in effect that the affidavits which certain witnesses signed and filed in the Patent Office were prepared by Adams or his solicitors and were never read nor sworn to by the affiants and that the statements appearing in the affidavits respecting certain uses and experiments were untrue. It is inferable that the Patent Office relied upon these affidavits and was induced to act by reason of their presentation.

The master, however, heard other witnesses who were examined and cross-examined. At least two witnesses flatly contradicted the testimony of B. After thus seeing and hearing all the witnesses the master found:

"The affidavit of Besselman on the 10th day of May, 1916, was signed and sworn to by him; that at the time he knew the contents thereof; that the statements contained therein were true; and that his testimony in this case was false, and that the Government has failed in its contention that letters patent to Joseph H. Adams No. 1320354, serial No. 530852, filed December, granted October 28, 1919, on application 1909, were obtained by means of fraudulent and deceptive affidavits and statements."

Our study of the testimony does not justify a disturbance of this unequivocal finding by the trier of fact who saw and heard the witnesses who so flatly contradicted each other.

The same disposition may be made of the Government's contention respecting M. W. Kellogg & Co.

Respecting queries 2 and 3, little need be said in view of our ultimate conclusion as to the validity of the patents. This court is divided respecting the right of the Government to attack the validity of the patents in these proceedings. We are satisfied, however, that we may inquire into the prior art to ascertain the scope of the claims of the various patents involved.

Having made that study, we conclude that: (a) All of the patents cover improvements only. (b) None of them are basic or pioneer patents. (c) All claims should be construed accordingly.

It by no means follows, however, that because the claims of a patent merely cover improvements, and must be denied a wide range of equivalency, that they are unimportant or that the inventor did not make a real contribution to the art. Moreover, if a narrow patent is valid, it furnishes as sufficient a consideration for a contract based on it as would a pioneer or basic patent and it is as legitimate a subject of cross-license agreement as is a basic or pioneer patent.

Without discussing each patent at length and in detail, we will content ourselves with a statement of our conclusion. For the purposes of this suit, we are not willing to disturb the master's finding that the patents are valid.

Validity of agreements: Seventy-nine agreements are involved. They may be referred to for convenience sake as cross-licensing and sublicensing agreements, although some of them include provisions that deal with subjects other than licenses.

Opposing counsel approach the consideration of them from different angles: Petitioner asserts that all of the provisions of all agreements must be read together while defendants contend that the validity of each provision must be separately considered and its legality determined without regard to its effect upon any of the parties other than those who executed the agreement.

Petitioner contends that the primary defendants restrained trade and commerce in cracked gasoline; that such control is obtained through so-called cross-license agreements; that by such agreements the parties thereto secure an unauthorized extension of the patent monopoly both as to time and subject matter, and an avoidance of any attack upon the validity of the patents by any of the defendants. It also, so it is asserted, restricted production, destroyed competition, imposed unjustifiable royalties, and restricted the use of the process by others to the detriment of the consumer.

Defendants contend that the grant of a patent is a grant of a monopoly; that while such a monopoly is a burden on commerce, it is a lawful burden; that the owner of a patent may grant licenses thereunder, whether few or many, and the effect of each license agreement is to partially lift the lawful monopoly evidenced by the patent. In short, it is argued, licenses promote instead of restrict competition, and license agreements, no matter what their conditions may be, necessarily extend the freedom to manufacture and to sell the patented article. They, therefore, contend their arguments are not within the condemnation of the Sherman antitrust law.

The ownership of a patent unquestionably carries with it certain rights, monopolistic in character. Nevertheless, the owner of a patent can use it as property only subject to the Sherman antitrust law; that is to say, A, B, C, and D can not legally contract respecting their patents in violation of the terms of this law. The patent may confer a right which, distinct from the agreement, is in the nature of a monopoly. To this extent the Sherman antitrust law does not apply to patent monopolies. And, of course, this right to enjoy a patent monopoly carries with it certain rights incident thereto. Among them are the right to royalties, to grant licenses, as well as the right to handicap competitors by withholding licenses.

As the owner of a patent one may exclusively occupy the field covered by the patent. He may contract as an incident thereto. He may license one and refuse to license another. But he can not, merely because of his ownership of a patent, enter into an agreement with another party, perhaps also the owner of a patent, which has for its object or its inevitable result the burdening of commerce or the lessening of competition beyond the limits of the patent monopoly. (American Column & Lumber Co. et al v. United States, 257 U. S. 377; United States v. Motion Picture Patents Co. et al., 225 Fed. 800, 810; United States v. New Departure Manufacturing Co. et al., 204 Fed. 107; Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. v. United States of America, 226 U. S. 20, 48.) We quote from the opinion in the last cited case:

"The trade was, therefore, practically controlled from producer to consumer and the potency of the scheme was established by the cooperation of 85 per cent of the manufacturers, and their fidelity to it was secured not only by trade advantages but by what was practically a pecuniary penalty, not inaptly termed in the argument 'cash bail.' The royalty for each furnace was $5, 80 per cent of which was to be returned if the agreement was faithfully observed; it was to be 'forfeited as a penalty' if the agreement was violated. And for faithful observance of their engagement the jobbers, too, were entitled to rebates from their purchases. It is testified that 90 per cent of the jobbers in number and more than 90 per cent in purchasing power joined the combination.

"The agreements clearly, therefore, transcended what was necessary to protect the use of the patent or the momonopoly which the law conferred upon it. They passed to the purpose and accomplished a restraint of trade condemned by the Sherman law. * * *

"The added element of the patent in the case at bar can not confer immunity from a like condemnation, for the reasons we have stated. And this we say without entering into the consideration of the distinction of rights for which the Government contends between a patented article and a patented tool used in the manufacture of an unpatented article. Rights conferred by patents are indeed very definite and extensive, but they do not give any more than other rights a universal license against positive prohibitions. The Sherman law is a limitation of rights, rights which may be pushed to evil consequences and therefore restrained.

"This court has had occasion in a number of cases to declare its principle. Two of those cases we have cited. The others it is not necessary to review or to quote from, except to say that in the very latest of them the comprehensive and thorough character of the law is demonstrated and its sufficiency to prevent evasions of its policy 'by resort to any disguise or subterfuge of form,' or the escape of its prohibitions 'by any indirection.' (United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 181.) Nor can they be evaded by good motives. The law is its own measure of right and wrong, of what it permits or forbids, and the judgment of the courts can not be set up against it in a supposed accommodation of its policy with the good intention of parties, and it may be of some good results. (United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association, 166 U. S. 290; Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 209 U. S. 56, 62.)"

Applying this rule to the instant suit, it is apparent that defendants were permitted to execute cross licenses to one another. They were not, however, permitted to enter into agreements the effect of which was to extend their monopoly beyond the limitations which were fixed by the patent grant; or, to express it differently, where the contract would be illegal because of violation of the Sherman antitrust law, were it not for the existing patents, the illegality is eliminated merely to the extent of the monopoly represented by the patent grant and to rights which necessarily flow therefrom.

Before examining the agreements and applying the validity test the following facts constitute a necessary background.

Gasoline: Gasoline produced by the pressure cracking process may be used separately or freely mixed with the same product manufactured by any of the other processes. In other words, the product—gasoline—is the same for all practical purposes whether produced by pressure cracking or by the straight run or other processes. Gasoline, however produced, is not a commodity covered by a patent.

The percentage of gasoline produced by the cracking process has increased steadily during the last 15 years. Not less than 25 per cent of all gasoline manufactured in the United States was in 1925 produced by pressure cracking processes and this percentage is constantly increasing.

Volume of business: The master found that "the aggregate cracking capacity of all the defendants (primary and secondary) is about 55 per cent of the total cracking capacity in the United States." Petitioner asserts that the "primary defenders in 1921 produced 72.96 per cent of all cracked gasoline refined in the United States while in 1924 they produced 81.05 per cent;" that in 1921 the primary defendants and their licensees refined 86.39 per cent, while in 1924 the same parties refined 93.96 per cent of all cracked gasoline produced in the country. It is the actual production rather than "cracking capacity" that is significant. We accept the production test rather than the capacity test.

Infringements of patents by primary defendants: The defendants contend and the master found that the cross-license agreements were made in good faith and to avoid patent infringement suits.

It appears, however, that the principal patents of the primary defendants which are the subject of the cross-license agreements may each be practiced without infringing the other. For example, the so-called Burton patents of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana are not infringed by the Holmes-Manley process of the Texas Co. nor the Cross patents of the Gasoline Products Co. nor by the tube and tank process. Subsequent to the execution of the agreements, each of the primary defendants continued to follow the teachings of its own patent. The processes described in the claims of many patents were not adopted by any primary defendant not the owner of such patents. Some of the claims of some of the patents are not followed by any of the primary defendants.

We herewith quote excerpts from agreements Nos. 31, 55, and 74:

Agreement No. 31

"SECTION 1. That the term 'patents rights' as used in this agreement refers to all issued United States patents and pending applications therefor specified in Schedules A and B and all inventions relating to processes and apparatus for the manufacture of gasoline and other light oils by cracking under pressure, and relating to the products and by-products of such processes and apparatus, and relating to processes and apparatus for refining such products, acquired prior to January 1, 1937; also all future United States patents or divisible patent rights of the same general nature acquired by either party (directly or indirectly) prior to January 1, 1937, together with any and all inventions and improvements disclosed in said patents and applications, or pertaining thereto.

"SEC. 2. The Indiana Co. acknowledges the validity of all patents of the said Texas Co. as and when issued under which it becomes licensed hereunder. The Texas Co. acknowledges the validity of all patents of the Indiana Co. as and when issued under which it becomes licensed hereunder.

"SEC. 3. Each party hereto grants to the other an irrevocable and nonexclusive license to employ said patent rights in its own plants and those of its subsidiaries, said license to continue to the expiration of any patents included within the aforesaid patent rights. All subsidiaries and controlled companies shall continue to pay royalties if licensed under said patent rights at the time they shall become subsidiaries or controlled companies as defined herein.

"SEC. 5. The Indiana Co. shall be at liberty to modify the terms of or grant substitutes for any of its licenses now in force (excepting the licenses of the White Eagle and Aetna Refining Cos., which licenses shall not be altered except by mutual consent of the parties hereto), provided that the Indiana Co. shall not in such substitute licenses reduce the royalty rate below three-tenths cent per gallon of stock charged to the pressure stills, and shall not fix any maximum without the consent of the Texas Co. except under the following conditions:

"(a) The license shall provide that the licensee shall not avail itself of the patent rights of the Texas Co. conveyed by said license, or any additional patent rights extended to it, so as to materially increase the yield of light hydrocarbons from a given quantity of charging stock or materially to increase the conversion capacity of a still of a given size, without an adjustment of royalty rates by mutual agreement of the parties to the license before the licensee shall be permitted commercially to employ said inventions;

"(b) The maximum royalty per year on each still shall not be reduced below 56¼ cents per gallon of charging capacity of the stills, as defined in section 10 of the form of license attached.

"SEC. 6. Either party shall be at liberty to grant licenses under the patent rights of both parties, but only upon terms and conditions mutually agreed upon by the parties. It is agreed that the forms of license hereto attached for the processes and locations therein shown are satisfactory.

"SEC. 13. The Texas Co. agrees that, if at any time prior to January 1, 1937, the amount of gasoline manufactured by it by pressure cracking within the States of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and Oklahoma shall exceed 25 per cent of the gasoline manufactured by the Indiana Co. through operations of the same character in said territory, then the Texas Co. agrees that the Indiana Co. shall have an option to purchase one-third of such excess manufacture, the amount of such manufacture to be determined and said option to be exercised upon the terms and conditions following:

"(a) Each company shall upon request furnish the other a statement at the end of the first six months of any year covering its said manufacture in said territory and said six months' period shall be taken as the basis in determining the percentages hereunder.

"(b) Notice of the exercise of said option to purchase shall be given by the Indiana Co. to the Texas Co. on or before the 1st day of October following the said six months' period.

"(c) Deliveries shall begin with the month of January following the exercise of said option by the Indiana Co. and shall continue in approximately equal monthly installments through the calendar year.

"(d) The price to be paid by the Indiana Co. to the Texas Co. shall be the wholesale price for such gasoline at the time of delivery to be fixed by agreement between the parties hereto; or, in the event of their inability to agree, then such price shall be determined by arbitration, each party selecting one arbitrator, and these two shall select a third. The decision of a majority of the board of arbitration so constituted shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto. Such arbitrators, in arriving at a decision, shall, among other factors, take into consideration the Chicago tank wagon market price of the Indiana Co. for its gasoline, the cost of transportation, the cost of marketing, and a reasonable selling profit.

"(e) The quality of the gasoline to be delivered to the Indiana Co., in the event it shall exercise its option to purchase, shall be equal to that being marketed generally by the Indiana Co. at the time of such delivery throughout said territory under the brand of 'Red Crown.'

"(f) If the event this section 13 shall for any reason be held unenforceable, such holding shall not affect or extend to the contract as a whole, or any of its other provisions, which shall, nevertheless, remain in full force and effect."

Agreement No. 55

This agreement was entered into between the Texas Co. and the Gasoline Products Co. on January 26, 1923, and referred particularly to 43 patents or patent applications. Among the provisions are:

"2. The term 'patent rights' for the purpose of this agreement shall be deemed to mean, in the case of each party, all United States letters patent and pending applications therefor specified in Schedules A or B, as the case may be, and all inventions relating to processes and apparatus for the manufacture of gasoline and other light oils by cracking under pressure, and relating to the products and by-products of such processes and apparatus, and relating to processes and apparatus for refining such products, acquired prior to January 1, 1937; also all future United States patents or divisible patent rights of the same general nature acquired by either party (directly or indirectly) prior to January 1, 1937, together with any and all inventions and improvements disclosed in said patents and applications, or pertaining thereto.

"3. The term 'stock charged' as used for the purpose of this agreement shall be deemed to mean petroleum or petroleum oils of whatever character, including cycled stock, charged into the pressure equipment.

"6. The Gasoline Co. agrees for itself and its assigns not to make any charge of infringement of its patent rights or bring any suit for an injunction or damages for infringement of its patent rights against either the Texas Co. or any present or future licensee under the patent rights of the Texas Co., including the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana), and its present or future licensees who are or shall be licensed under the Texas Co.'s patent rights, charging infringement under the patent rights of the Gasoline Co. by reason of the practice, past or future, of any process in which the cracking occurs only with substantial distillation, or of any cracking process operated entirely below 450 pounds' pressure per square inch.

"7. The Gasoline Co. shall have the right to grant a nonexclusive license to any of its present licesees under the patent rights of the Texas Co., but limited to manufacture and use by such licensees in installations in which the cracking is performed only by said Cross process, the manufacture, use, or sale of the apparatus for such installations and/or the sale of the products of such manufacture and use, upon the payment to the Texas Co. of whichever is the greater of (a) 2 cents per barrel stock charged or (b) 30 per cent of the total money collected from such licensees by the Gasoline Co. as royalty or damages for operations beginning 30 days after date of this agreement. In the case of the Indian Refining Co. the payment shall be either 1 cent per barrel stock charged or 30 per cent of said total money, whichever is greater.

"The Gasoline Co. shall have the right also to grant to its future licensees a nonexclusive license under the patent rights of the Texas Co., but limited to manufacture and use by such licensees in installations in which the cracking is performed only by said Cross process, the manufacture, use, and sale of the apparatus for such installations, and/or the sale of the products of such manufacture and use, upon the payment to the Texas Co. of whichever is the greater of (a) 2.4 cents per barrel of stock charged or (b) 30 per cent of the total money collected from such licensees by the Gasoline Co. as royalty or damages for any operations subsequent to the issuance of such license.

"8. The Texas Co. agrees to open negotiations with the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana), and/or the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), and/or the Standard Development Co., to the end of acquiring for the Gasoline Co. the right to the latter of conferring upon its licensees, present and future, in addition to the nonexclusive license under the patent rights of the Texas Co., a similar nonexclusive license, limited in the same manner as in the case of the Texas Co., under the hereinafter designated patent rights of said companies respectively.

"If and when the right to grant such limited nonexclusive licenses, under either or both of the patent rights defined in the following paragraphs designated (a) and (b), shall become vested in the Gasoline Co. from the owners thereof, or either of them, the Gasoline Co. shall be obligated to pay to the Texas Co. an additional 10 per cent of the total money collected by the Gasoline Co. from its present licensees as royalty or damages for operations beginning 30 days after the date of the vesting of such rights.

"If and when the right to grant such limited nonexclusive licenses, under all United States letters patent, pending applications therefor and all inventions relating to processes and apparatus for the manufacture of gasoline and other light oils by cracking under pressure, and relating to the products and by-products of such processes and apparatus, and relating to processes and apparatus for refining such products, now owned or acquired prior to January 1, 1937, by the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana), also all future United States patents or divisible patent rights of the same general nature acquired by the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) (directly or indirectly) prior to January 1, 1937, together with any and all inventions and improvements disclosed in said patents and applications, or pertaining thereto, shall become vested in the Gasoline Co. from the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) the Gasoline Co. shall be obligated to pay to the Texas Co. an additional sum from its future licensees of whichever is the greater of (a) 1.2 cents per barrel charged, or (b) 10 per cent of the total money collected by the Gasoline Co. from such future licensees as royalty or damages for any operations beginning 30 days after the vesting of such rights.

"The Gasoline Co. shall in any event be obligated to pay to the Texas Co. not less than the following percentages of the total money collected by the Gasoline Co. from its present and future licensees under any or all of the patent rights of the Gasoline Co. as royalty or damages for operations within the United States beginning at the time specified and continuing during the life of this agreement:

"(a) Not less than 30 per cent collected from each of the present and future licensees from the date hereof;

"(b) Not less than 40 per cent collected from each of the present licensees beginning 30 days after the right to grant limited nonexclusive licenses under the patent rights of either or both of the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana), and the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey), and the Standard Development Co. shall have been vested in the Gasoline Co. as hereinbefore provided;

"(c) Not less than 40 per cent collected from each of the future licensees beginning 30 days after the right to grant limited nonexclusive licenses under the patent rights of the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) shall have been vested in the Gasoline Co. as hereinbefore provided;

"(d) Not less than 40 per cent collected from each of the future licensees beginning 30 days after the right to grant limited nonexclusive licenses under the patent rights of the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) and the Standard Development Co. shall have been vested in the Gasoline Co. as hereinbefore provided;

"(e) Not less than 50 per cent collected from each of the future licensees beginning 30 days after the right to grant limited nonexclusive licenses under the patent rights of both the Standard Oil Co. (Indiana) and the Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey) and the Standard Development Co. shall have been vested in the Gasoline Co. as hereinbefore provided."

Agreement No. 74, entered into between Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and the Texas Co., September 28, 1923:

"SEC. III. (a) Jersey licenses Texas and Indiana under its patent rights, excepting that no license is hereby granted for the tube and tank process. Jersey agrees that it will on request license Indiana and/or Texas and their respective 100 per cent subsidaries only under its patent rights for the tube and tank process at 5 cents per barrel of oil throughout.

"(b) Texas and Indiana license Jersey, Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, and Humble Oil & Refining Co. under their (Texas and/or Indiana) patent rights, except that no license is hereby granted for the Holmes-Manley and/or Burton processes. Texas and Indiana agree that they will on request license Jersey and its 100 per cent subsidiaries and Humble Oil & Refining Co., under their patent rights for the Holmes-Manley process, at 8.4 cents per barrel of oil, fresh stock.

"(c) Indiana and Texas agree to extend the present temporary modified license contracts running from Indiana to Jersey and to Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana until December 1, 1931, and to license Jersey and Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, but no other or future subsidiary of Jersey, under their (Indiana and Texas) patent rights for the practice of the Burton process thereafter, royalty free.

"SEC. V. (a) Jersey agrees to deliver to Texas upon the execution hereof a duly executed copy of a certain grant running to Gasoline Products Co. (Inc.), a copy of which is attached as Exhibit A.

"(b) Texas agrees to deliver to Jersey upon the execution hereof a duly executed copy of a certain grant running to Jersey from Gasoline Products Co. (Inc.), a copy of which is attached as Exhibit B.

"(d) Each party agrees that it will not in the future grant any license or release under the patent rights of any other party hereto (without its consent) to one who at that time holds (of record) or is actually known to the licensor to own or control patent rights which are infringed by the pyrolitic cracking operations of said other party hereto.

"SEC. VII. (a) Jersey agrees to pay to Indiana one-half of all royalties received by it (and/or its 100 per cent subsidiaries) after the effective date hereof from licensees of the tube and tank process (under any or all the patent rights of Texas and/or Indiana), or 5 cents per barrel of oil (throughout) run by such licensees, whichever is the greater, such payments to be made when and as such royalties are collected, expenses of collection, if any, to be borne equally by Jersey and Indiana, provided that—

"(1) All present licensees of Jersey shall be considered to be licensees under the patent rights of Indiana and Texas, but in the case of existing license contracts Jersey shall pay only one-half of the royalties received after the effective date hereof by it, and in the case of existing license contracts made according to the plan and at the rate of Exhibit D attached hereto, such payment shall be subject to being returned to Jersey for return to licensees to the extent and under the conditions provided in Exhibit D.

"(2) Jersey shall make no payment to Indiana and/or Texas for any royalties it receives from Indiana and/or Texas in the event they exercise the option given to them in Section III, paragraph (a) hereof, to take a license under the tube and tank process.

"(3) In the event Indiana and/or Texas shall in the future establish a rate of royalty less than 16.8 cents per barrel fresh stock, or 25 per cent of the net profit, then Jersey shall be privileged to reduce its minimum payment of 5 cents per barrel proportionately to the reduction in royalty made by Indiana or Texas.

"(4) The Standard Development Co., a patents holding subsidiary of Jersey, may collect royalties from Jersey, Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana, and from the Humble Oil & Refining Co. without accounting or payment of any kind to Indiana or Texas.

"(b) Jersey shall pay to Indiana in any case not less than one-half of all moneys received from any future licensees of the tube and tank process, such payments to be made when and as such royalties are collected, expenses of collection, if any, to be borne equally by Jersey and Indiana.

"(c) Indiana agrees to pay to Texas one-fourth of all royalties paid after the effective date hereof to Indiana by Jersey and Standard Oil Co. of Louisiana for operations under the Burton process within 30 days from the date such royalties are received, and Texas agrees to pay said one-fourth of said royalties to the Standard Development Co. within 15 days after the date on which it is received by Texas from Indiana."

Section 13 of agreement 31 is cited by petitioner as one covenant of this contract which violates the Sherman Act. It obligates the Texas Co. to sell, under certain conditions, gasoline by it manufactured to the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana. It is not restricted to gasoline manufactured by any process covered by any patent. This covenant clearly violates the Sherman Act.

A patentee may, as against its agent or licensee, impose conditions respecting sales, the price, and the territory whereat and wherein the patented article may be sold. United States v. General Electric Co. (272 U. S. 476). For the purpose of this argument it may be conceded that such restrictive covenant may include a commodity which, though not covered by a patent, is the product of a patented process. But such covenant can not include an unpatented article not made by patentee's patented process or apparatus. The vice of this covenant lies in the fact that there is no restriction as to the commodity which was the subject of the agreement. The product was gasoline manufactured by pressure cracking, irrespective of the process used in producing it.

The defendants asserted, however, that this covenant never has been and never will be enforced, and therefore is of no significance. When this statement was made on oral argument the court suggested, in order to test the good faith of defendants' assertion, that the parties agree to its elimination. Defendants accepted the suggestion and filed with the court an agreement in the nature of a waiver of this provision of agreement 31. To this action the petitioner strenuously objected, insisting that defendants should not be permitted to avoid the effect of this litigation by an eleventh-hour withdrawal from its previously asserted right to thus contract. Were this the only provision objected to, we would view the litigation as happily ended. But there are other agreements which are attacked and, if the attacks be sustained, a decree for petitioner must necessarily follow.

For example, sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this same agreement 31, provide that the contracting parties shall acknowledge the validity of all patents that may be issued to the other "as and when issued under which it becomes licensed hereunder." Section 1 of the same agreement defines the term "patent rights" as including all patents and pending applications "and all inventions relating to processes and apparatus for the manufacture of gasoline and other light oils by cracking under pressure, acquired prior to January 1, 1937." Section 3 grants, each to the other, licenses to continue to the expiration of any patents included within the aforesaid "patent rights."

These agreements do not expire until 17 years from January 1, 1937. Or, stated in another way, the agreement which was made August 26, 1921, protected patents from attack which might be issued as late as January 1, 1937, and which would not expire until 1954.

Such agreements can not be sustained. While a patent is presumptively valid, many of them, although duly issued, are invalid for various reasons. The public, in whose interest the patent laws are enacted (Kendal v. Winsor, 21 How. 322) is ordinarily protected against the burden of such void patent grants by the action of competitors of the patentee who, prompted by motives of self-preservation, refuse to recognize these void patents and therefore successfully contest them. The public is thereby relieved of the burden which their existence entails.

By these clauses of agreement 31 and similar clauses in the other agreements, the parties purchased immunity from attack on their patents. Tying the hands and sealing the lips of the only parties who would ordinarily stand suit and contest the validity of the patents, the primary defendants attempted to fasten on the public burdens which it was not the purpose of the patent law to impose. Such agreements violate the letter and the spirit of the patent law and are contrary to public policy. The far-reaching consequences of such agreements is illustrated by the present case.

Further attack upon this agreement is made because of the effect of subsequently executed agreements, which not only dealt with royalties but enlarged the scope of this agreement by including other defendants who were large producers and refiners of gasoline. Agreements 55 and 74 include the other two primary defendants, the Standard Oil of New Jersey and the Gasoline Products Co. Section 8 of agreement 55 obligated the Texas Co. to open negotiations with the Standard Oil of Indiana and Standard Oil of New Jersey:

"* * * to the end of acquiring for the Gasoline Products Co. the right of conferring upon its licensees, present and future, in addition to the nonexclusive patents under the license rights of the Texas Co. a similar nonexclusive license from the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana and the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey."

Agreement 55 dealt with and fixed the royalties which were to be charged and provided for a division of these royalties between the primary defendants. The plan is made more effective by the two other agreements, 73 and 75, the first being between Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and the Texas Co., and the latter agreement being between the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey and the Gasoline Products Co.

In determining their validity these various agreements must be read together. They interlock. Swift & Co. v. United States (196 U. S. 396.) Viewed as one, they present a situation where the primary defendants not only fixed royalties as between themselves but for their sublicensees, and provided for a division among themselves of the moneys received from such royalties.

There appears no logical relation between the protection which attached to the exclusive right which arose from the issuance of the patents and the agreements which the holders of the patents generally entered into. The agreements therefore transcend what was necessary to protect the patents and come within the operation of the antitrust act.

It may be conceded that A may fix the royalty which he shall exact from B as arbitrarily as he chooses. Such patentee may, even within a limited field, grant such licenses upon condition that his competitor execute to him a license to use said competitor's patented process. But such patentees may not, when to a large degree they dominate the trade, enter into an agreement for the pooling of their royalties and thereby increase the tribute exacted from the users.

To illustrate, A has a valid patent used by numerous licensees. B has a valid patent which other licensees use. Notwithstanding A and B each has a monopoly, there is competition. But it would be a plain violation of the antitrust act for A and B, thus having certain monopolies which are in competition one with another, to combine to eliminate competition between their monopolies and impose or maintan burdens which exist not by virtue of the monopolies but by virtue of the agreements dealing with their monopolies as property.

It is in this respect that these various agreements step outside the limits of lawful monopolies which arose from the issuance of the patents. The patent monopoly itself is a property right and agreements in respect thereto must be subject to the same antimonopoly tests as any other property rights.

There is no substantial difference between agreements entered into by competing packing companies respecting the prices at which or territories wherein their products may be sold and an agreement between holders of patent monopolies which fix the rates of royalties that shall be charged to licensees.

In fact we may go further and say that pooling agreements between holders of patents whereby royalties are fixed and the division of proceeds derived from royalties provided for are within the condemnation of the Sherman antitrust law. True, in such cases the court must inquire into the effect and extent of such agreements. But if the evidence, as here, discloses a domination of the trade and an additional burden by virtue of the agreement, the act is violated. And there can be no legitimate question respecting the extent of the domination by the primary defendants. Whether we accept petitioner's version of the testimony or the defendants' statement of the extent to which these defendants dominate the industry, the conclusion must be the same. In either case the percentage is so large as to necessitate the conclusion that the royalties materially and substantially affect the price of gasoline.

In so far as these agreements are license agreements, they are unobjectionable. To the extent that they go beyond license agreements, they are subject to the inhibitions of the Sherman Act.

It is worthy of note that none of the primary defendants use any considerable number of the patents of the other. This is established by the admission of the defendants. An independent producer, however, could hardly engage in the process of refining gas by a cracking process without infringing one or more of the patented cracking processes. One such refiner might infringe the process of one primary defendant, while another independent refiner would run afoul of another patent. Under these circumstances the holders of the patent, in fixing royalties by agreement, are in effect and for all practical purposes entering into an agreement to fix prices. For it is affirmatively established that the royalties fixed in the agreements and maintained by the agreements is a substantial part of the cost of refining. In fact the evidence justifies a finding that such royalties nearly equal and sometime exceed the profits of outside refiners.

If, then, the royalty charges directly affect the price at which the commodity can be produced, and if the agreements have for their object or for their necessary effect the fixing and maintaining of royalties, they can not be distinguished from other agreements which have been condemned, the purpose or necessary result of which was to fix the price of a commodity. United States v. Trenton Potteries (273 U. S. 392, 397–398). The court there said:

"The aim and result of every price-fixing agreement, if effective, is the elimination of one form of competition. The power to fix prices, whether reasonably exercised or not, involves power to control the market and to fix arbitrary and unreasonable prices. The reasonable price fixed to-day may through economic and business changes become the unreasonable price of to-morrow. Once established, it may be maintained unchanged because of the absence of competition secured by the agreement for a price reasonable when fixed. Agreements which create such potential power may well be held to be in themselves unreasonable or unlawful restraints without the necessity of minute inquiry whether a particular price is reasonable or unreasonable as fixed and without placing on the Government in inforcing the Sherman law the burden of ascertaining from day to day whether it has become unreasonable through the mere variation of economic conditions. Moreover, in the absence of express legislation requiring it, we should hesitate to adopt a construction making the difference between legal and illegal conduct in the field of business relations depend upon so uncertain a test as whether prices are reasonable—a determination which can be satisfactorily made only after a complete survey of our economic organiaztion and a choice between rival philosophies. Compare United States v. Cohen Grocery Co. (255 U. S. 81); International Harvester Co. v. Kentucky (234 U. S. 216); Nash v. United States, supra. Thus viewed, the Sherman law is not only a prohibition against the infliction of a particular type of public injury, it 'is a limitation of rights, * * * which may be pushed to evil consequences and therefore restrained.' Standard Sanitary Manufacturing Co. v. United States (226 U. S. 20, 49)."

Defining the term "unreasonable," the court says:

"That only those restraints upon interstate commerce which are unreasonable are prohibited by the Sherman law was the rule laid down by the opinions of this court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases. But it does not follow that agreements to fix or maintain prices are reasonable restraints and therefore permitted by the statute, merely because the prices themselves are reasonable. Reasonableness is not a concept of definite and unchanging content. Its meaning necessarily varies in the different fields of the law, because it is used as a convenient summary of the dominant considerations which control in the application of legal doctrines. Our view of what is a reasonable restraint of commerce is controlled by the recognized purpose of the Sherman law itself. Whether this type of restraint is reasonable or not must be judged in part at least in the light of its effect on competition, for whatever difference of opinion there may be among economists as to the social and economic desirability of an unrestrained competitive system, it can not be doubted that the Sherman law and the judicial decisions interpreting it are based upon the assumption that the public interest is best protected from the evils of monopoly and price control by the maintenance of competition. See U. S. v. Trans-Missouri Freight Association (166 U. S. 290); Standard Oil Co. v. United States, supra; American Column Co. v. United States (257 U. S. 377, 400); United States v. Linseed Oil Co. (262 U. S. 371, 388); Eastern States Lumber Association v. United States (234 U. S. 600, 614)."

The petitioner is entitled to a decree in its favor in accordance with the views hereinbefore expressed. Counsel for both parties will confer upon the terms of such decree before submitting it to the court. If unable to agree as to its terms, it will be presented to this court on due notice.

Anderson, circuit judge: I am unable to concur in the views expressed by a majority of the court. In my judgment the Government's exceptions to the master's report should be overruled, the master's report should be approved, and a decree entered dismissing the bill.

JUNE 11, 1929.

AMERICA'S WORST TARIFF BILL

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, is ill and unable to attend Congress. As all others did, he obtained consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the tariff bill. He prepared those remarks, but did not get them in in time. I ask unanimous consent that they may go into the RECORD now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that remarks prepared by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SABATH, be permitted to be extended in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this bill is the most vicious and most unfair piece of legislation that has been passed in the House of Representatives during my 24 years of service in this body. It will go down in history as America's worst tariff bill.

The Payne-Aldrich bill and the Fordney-McCumber bill were vicious, but this bill excels them and can not in any way be compared in viciousness.

I, as a Democrat, as did many other Democrats, went on record in the last campaign in favor of tariff legislation that would protect American industry and the interest of the American wage earner, and we were ready, willing, and anxious, and are ready and desirous now, to cast our votes to protect the American wage earner and the American manufacturer against unfair competition, but, unfortunately, the Republican majority in the House has made this impossible by refusal to give us a bill that would accomplish these desirable purposes.

We are precluded and are prevented by the special rule adopted by the Republican majority from submitting or offering amendments that would give the Nation tariff legislation that would be beneficial to the entire country instead of a few special interests.

The increased duty on sugar and on many other necessities of life will place additional burdens upon the American people of not less than $150 annually for each and every family in the United States, and may I ask for whose benefit?

Is it in the interest of the commerce of the Nation? Is it in the interest of the American wage earner? Is it in the interest of the farmer? Indeed not!

It is solely in the interest of the Sugar Trust and other large combinations, trusts, and special interests.

It is indeed unfortunate that the so-called agricultural Representatives in the House, as well as some of the former leaders who have so positively and so often promised the farmer relief and aid, have, by casting their votes for this legislation and making possible its adoption, if not deliberately then at least ignorantly betrayed the interests of the farmers and the consumers of this country.

It is a pitiful sight to thus witness the betrayal of the masses of the people. They were definitely and solemnly promised relief from the almost unbearable burdens of taxation in the form of high cost of living. But they are not to receive the promised relief. Instead, under the terms of this vicious tariff bill, their burdens are to be still further increased.

BILL WILL MEAN INCREASED COST OF LIVING

This bill taxes the things the people eat, use, and wear from the cradle to the grave. The citizen will pay this increased taxation, not directly to the tax collector but in the form of increased prices of the things he and the wife must buy every day of their lives in order to live. And a very large part of this increase in the price of the things they buy will never reach the Treasury of the United States, as taxes ordinarily levied would do, but will only go to swell the colossal profits of trusts and combinations, who fatten upon the public under the protection of tariff bills such as the one now before us. Nor will wages increase, for it is a well-known fact that the big employer will not pay his workmen a cent more than he has to pay them; and it is a further fact that can not successfully be denied that the most highly protected industries in the United States pay the lowest wages.

It is very evident that the purpose of this tariff bill is to repay political debts to Republican campaign-fund contributors. With the great special interests of this country this business of Republican campaign-fund contributions and the tariff is all a mere business matter, an investment, if you please. They contribute enormous sums to the Republican Party campaign chest with the expectation and assurance, even if unwritten, that the tariff will be increased to such an extent that they will be able to receive back in the form of increased profits on their goods not only the amounts of their campaign contributions but fabulous profits in addition. It is an old racket between the Republican Party and the tariff trusts. The average consumer is the goat, or the lamb, as you choose, but in either case the one that is to be fleeced. Men, women, and children must thus suffer by reason of increased cost of living.

That such legislation as this is bound to have a detrimental effect upon the commerce of the Nation must be recognized by every student and informed man.

But remember! The country is awakening. It is not too late, my Republican friends, to mend your ways and change this bill. It can be done in the Senate and it can be done by the conferees of the two Houses in the interest of the millions and millions of Americans, who, notwithstanding the so-called prosperity, have suffered tremendously in the last few years. The farmer who is receiving practically nothing for his product; the wage earner who has had his salary cut to the very minimum; the small manufacturer and the small business man who has suffered reverses, must be and should be taken into consideration before final action is taken on this legislation.

The responsibility is yours and on you. You have made the promises. Will you again betray your trust? If you do not take heed, I am satisfied that you will never again receive the confidence of the American people.

I am not making these observations for political reasons. The only thought I have at heart is the interest of my country.

FAILURE TO RESTRICT DUTY-FREE PHILIPPINE SUGAR IS ONE GOOD FEATURE OF BILL

Mr. Speaker, there is one feature of the bill that I approve, and that is the omission of the provision advocated by the Sugar Trust to restrict the duty-free importation of Philippine sugar.

That omission is in the interest of American sugar consumers and is in the interest of justice and fair play for the Philippines.

I am in favor to-day and have always favored Philippine independence. I want to be free myself, and my sympathy goes out to other peoples who likewise desire to be free.

But as long as we retain sovereignty over the Philippines we owe it to them and to ourselves to treat them fairly. They are our wards, and it is our duty to protect them instead of exploit them.

The proposal of the sugar interests to restrict the amount of sugar the Philippines may export to the United States duty free to 500,000 tons annually is unjust, and especially so since we provide in this very tariff bill under discussion that American products shall enter the Philippines without limit and without tax. I understand the Sugar Trust is turning heaven and earth to have this Philippine-sugar restriction provision inserted in the tariff bill in the Senate, but I trust their efforts will fail.

The effort to restrict Philippine products will not end with the passage of the present tariff bill. The campaign of the restrictionists is but well begun. I have no doubt the Filipinos realize this full well, and will remain alert at all times to protect themselves.

The Philippines owe much credit for the absence of the restriction feature in the House bill to the presence here of a very able delegation of prominent Filipinos. Had they not been here the House bill might have included the restriction provision.

The delegation is headed by the Hon. Manuel Roxas, speaker of the Philippine House of Representatives, and an able and brilliant diplomat. Also on the mission is Senator Sergio Osmena, who has been in Washington on previous missions and has the respect of all Members of Congress with whom he has come in contact. The technical side of the sugar-restriction controversy is ably handled by the Hon. Rafael R. Alunan, Philippine secretary of agriculture and natural resources, who probably knows more about the Philippine sugar industry than any one man, American or Filipino. Serving as members of the delegation are the two Resident Commissioners, the Hon. PEDRO GUEVARA and the Hon. CAMILO OSIAS, who, as we all know, are both able and conscientious representatives of the Philippines.

It is indeed fortunate for the islands that these Filipino officials are all here in Washington at this time. When the delegation arrived here the situation was very critical. That the tariff bill was reported without the restriction feature is an evidence of the effectiveness of the labors of the delegation.

FISCAL RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia and to include therein a letter from the District auditor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated, and to include therein a letter from the District auditor. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I would not ask the indulgence of the House this morning were it not for the fact that I anticipate that in the regular session this winter I will again be chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that handles the District of Columbia bill. The question of fiscal relations between the District and the United States is settled in that bill. There are in this Congress approximately 70 new Members who have not heard this question discussed, save what has been said in the Washington press on the matter.

It appears to me that one of the purposes of these editorials now is to create in the mind of new Members the impression that Washington is a city much abused and in order that they may prejudge this issue. The reelected membership of the House have had this issue presented almost time without number, and have uniformly and overwhelmingly held that the United States has fairly and generously contributed to the cost of maintaining the city government. Not only has the Federal Government met every obligation that it could have were it a taxpayer, but has gone far beyond that in the amount of support, financial and otherwise, granted the Capital City; and yet a small group in Washington annually and persistently complain and demand more and more, and insist that the city taxpayer should pay proportionately less and less.

Because of this situation I, on June 11, discussed before the House certain false and misleading statements appearing editorially in the Washington press.

Among other statements, I quoted from an editorial in the Evening Star the statement that "the Federal Government, which, in 1921, decided that 40 per cent constituted its fair share in District appropriation bills, will be contributing approximately 20 per cent plus in the 1930 appropriations." I then charged that the statement was false and that the Federal contribution in the 1930 appropriation bill was approximately 28 per cent.

June 14, 1929, the Evening Star carried an editorial entitled "The Clash of Statistics," which was in the nature of a plea of confession and avoidance of the charges I had made against the paper. They state in part:

> The Star has said that according to Auditor Donovan's estimates the nine millions lump-sum payment of the Nation will for 1930 be 20 plus per cent of the total budget. Mr. SIMMONS declares that the only true statement of this percentage is approximately 28 per cent.

The plain inference of the statement is that Mr. Donovan, the District auditor, is authority for their statement that the Federal Government contributes but 20 per cent plus in the 1930 appropriations. Mr. Donovan is an outstanding, efficient, honest, capable city official. His word and his conclusions are respected in Washington. I can understand how the Star would like to have it appear that they are supported in their statements by Auditor Donovan, and why they would like to have it appear that I am at variance with him. On the contrary, he and I are in complete accord on this matter. I ask, Mr. Speaker, to insert in the RECORD on this point a letter from Mr. Donovan, the District auditor, fully discussing this matter, negativing the statement in the Star and supporting the statement that I have made hereofore.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 17, 1929.

Hon. ROBERT G. SIMMONS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN SIMMONS: This letter is furnished you in compliance with your request of me over the telephone Saturday that I advise you of the percentage proportion of divisible appropriations carried in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, represented by the payment of $9,000,000 by the United States, plus certain miscellaneous revenues released to and for the beneficial use of the District of Columbia by the United States under the lump-sum plan.

The appropriations carried in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1930 for all purposes total $38,772,615. Included in this amount are appropriations chargeable to special funds and which under governing law would not be payable in any part by the United States if 60-40 or any other percentage plan of appropriating for the District of Columbia were in effect during that fiscal year. The appropriations referred to are those chargeable to the gasoline-tax fund, amounting to $1,658,500, and appropriations chargeable to the water fund, amounting to $1,495,330. The law creating the gasoline-tax fund provides that it shall be made up of the 2-cent tax paid on motor-vehicle fuel imported into the District of Columbia and accretions from assessments under the Borland law, and shall be available for appropriation by Congress exclusively for road and street improvement and repair. The law with respect to the water service provides that it shall be a self-sustaining branch of the government of the District of Columbia. For these reasons, even on the assumption that a percentage plan of appropriation were in effect at this time or in the next fiscal year, appropriations of this character would not be considered as of a divisible nature; that is to say, payable in any part by the United States.

The District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1930 also contains provision for the reimbursement by the District of Columbia to the United States of $300,000 as the District's part of the cost of financing the liability of the United States to the employees' retirement and disability fund. It is now believed that this item could properly be considered as a divisible appropriation under a percentage plan of appropriation liability.

Deducting the gasoline tax and water funds appropriations for the fiscal year 1930 from the total appropriations of $38,772,615, the remainder of $35,618,785 represents what would be considered as appropriations divisible between the United States and the District of Columbia under 60-40 or other percentage plan of appropriating for the District. If only the $9,000,000 to be paid by the United States in 1930 toward financing appropriations for that year be considered, the proportion of the total divisible appropriations for 1930 represented by that sum would be 25.267 per cent. Excluding also the item of $300,000 to which reference has been made from the total of the divisible appropriations, and considering only the $9,000,000, the percentage of the United States would be 25.482 per cent.

But under the lump-sum plan the United States has released to and for the beneficial use of the District of Columbia certain miscellaneous revenues, estimated for the fiscal year 1930 at $965,000; so that in determining the real Federal participation or representation in the 1930 divisible appropriations under the lump-sum plan, this amount should be taken into consideration in addition to the $9,000,000. Considered on this basis, the proportion of District of Columbia appropriations for 1930 represented by Federal assistance would be 27.976 per cent, and excluding the item of $300,000 referred to, 28.214 per cent.

I trust that the foregoing supplies the information which you requested me to furnish you.

With very best wishes, believe me,

Sincerely yours,

D. J. DONOVAN,
Auditor of the District of Columbia.

THE CONSUMER AND THE PROTECTION TARIFF

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in respect to the tariff bill recently passed by the House, and to include in those remarks a letter signed by the heads of various agricultural organizations in the city of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that this distinctly comes within the line of matter which has heretofore been excluded from the RECORD. I do not object to the extension of the gentleman's own remarks, but I do object to having placed in the RECORD letters from various political and semipolitical, economic, and other organizations in the city of Washington. If we do that, we will have nothing in the RECORD but page after page of such material.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Yesterday or the day before the gentleman from Indiana was permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the same subject, including therein a statement of the National City Bank. This letter that I ask to have incorporated in my remarks in the RECORD is only one letter of four pages. It is signed by the heads of the various agricultural organizations. It is in part and in most respects an answer to that which was permitted to go into the RECORD yesterday or the day before. I do not think the gentleman ought to object under the circumstances.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that I was not here and did not object to the other proposition, I do not see how I can make an exception; but gentlemen will see what this leads to. One Member gets permission to insert in the RECORD letters and statements by others outside of Congress, and then another Member has to insert another letter or statement in order to counteract the first one. Therefore we have a debate in the RECORD by those who have no standing in Congress. That is one of the reasons which leads me to protect the RECORD as far as possible. I shall not object to this proposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINCENT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement issued on behalf of the national agricultural organizations.

The statement is as follows:

THE CONSUMER AND THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF

Present criticism of a proposed tariff on agricultural products is a direct attack on the American protective-tariff system. It is an attack hiding behind the cloak of an appeal to the "consuming public."

Certain interests, as yet veiled but easily identified by their self-evident purpose, say that the "consumer" will pay heavily for certain foods—beef, butter, sugar, bread, fruit, and vegetables—if tariff rates are levied as now proposed by Congress. These foods, the consumer is told, can be produced more cheaply in other countries and he has the right to buy where he can buy cheapest—the Argentines for cheap beef; New Zealand, cheap butter; Cuba, cheap sugar; Canada, cheap wheat; and Mexico, cheap vegetables.

This broadside of half truth needs a vigorous all-American analysis. The rest of the truth needs to be told, for every "producer" is a consumer; every "consumer" except the tramp is a "producer."

A tariff on these commodities is justified by a broader principle of fairness and general national interest than that which actuates this narrow selfishness of the critics.

If a foreign country can produce a product at a somewhat lower cost than it can be produced on American farms—take beef for example—then the absence of a tariff on beef would lead to two direct results.

The first would be, the flow of a vast amount of American money—consumer's money, if you will—to a place where it can be produced more cheaply—money once sent away never to come back, except as interest and profits, for the rich American capitalist and investor in foreign industry.

The second would be the ruin of the American beef-producing industry—a source of production of natural wealth and of employment of some million men; in fact, the destruction of a national self-sufficiency, indispensable to national defense and national honor. If that is not sufficient, then let it be also understood that these millions of men would cease buying the products of urban industries; automobiles, furniture, carpets, clothing, boots and shoes, etc., which they would purchase as prosperous producers and would flock into the urban industries, creating a veritable frame of underemployment.

This is the reverse side of these half truths and it should be shouted from every housetop.

In the campaign of half truth going on, the consumer is very certainly not reminded of that period following the World War, when he paid 30 cents a pound for sugar because he had to, because the foreign sugar producers were in control and temporarily without competition from domestic producers.

The industrial worker wants his job, needs his job, and the present wage or a larger one, or he is ruined. And his interest in that job far exceeds his interest in a cent or two more for even his beef or his fruit, or his sugar. And that job and its price is subject to just the same law of supply and demand as the price of the beef or the fruit or the sugar. He needs to know what will happen to the labor supply of the farmers and the men in the plants and factories, if a foregin food invasion, which completes the ruin of these agricultural industries, forces them to seek urban employment.

To summarize: If the consumer-producer would benefit by the maintenance of a steady market for his industry, he necessarily must be a purchaser of the products of others.

For you can not be a consumer and not be a producer or the dependent of a producer.

The established policy in America to-day, regardless of partisan politics, is for protection through tariff and through restricted immigration. This principle of protection to all classes, for all products, agricultural or industrial, must be applied with even-handed justice or that same justice, plus the most evident self-interest, demands that all bars of all kinds be let down, and we have a free-trade Nation, without exclusion laws against cheap labor or tariff restrictions against the products of cheap labor.

Without tariff protection "consumers" would buy steel, tractors, cream separators, and factory equipment more cheaply from Germany, shipping equipment from England, textiles from Czechoslovakia, paper products from Japan and China, sugar and starches from Java (where labor is paid 15 cents a day), crockery and dishes from Belgium and Sweden, dairy products from New Zealand and Denmark, fruits from the Tropics, fuel oil from Mexico, and on down the line, until our "consumers" would each and severally be either out of a job or working at the price of the cheap labor of the rest of the world—and buying nothing, because they would not have the money with which to buy.

The American protective tariff has enabled the consumer to be a consumer by making it possible for him to be a producer.

You can not eat your pie and have it. You can not send your beef money to the Argentines and sell your products to American producers. It is impossible to conceive our giving the keys of an American city to a foreign invader and then allow him to use his gunfire to destroy the men, women, and children of that city.

It is equally impossible for a government to invite foreign trade, built upon low standards and costs, into any branch of American industry, agricultural or nonagricultural.

Sugar is a farm product which has been especially singled out for attack in this campaign of half truth, so let us consider closely the difference in cost under a reasonable protective tariff.

Using accepted statistics, the average person's consumption of sugar is 100 pounds of sugar a year, and the proposed tariff would increase the cost 64 cents a year per person. However, this does not mean a direct consumption by each individual of 100 pounds a year or 64 cents a year increase, because included in the 100 pounds is the sugar used in bakery products, candy, soft drinks, ice cream, and the sugar served free to the consumer in hotels and restaurants.

Solely in the household, it has been estimated that the average sugar consumption is from 40 to 60 pounds a year per person. On this basis, then, the average cost of the increased tariff on sugar to the individual consumer in his own home is 38 cents a year.

The consumer must know this and must determine whether this insurance premium of 38 cents a year is worth the guaranty of protection from foreign control of the sugar market in the United States, a control the absence of which in 1920 cost him 30 cents a pound for sugar, or the rate of $12 to $18 a year per consumer. He must determine whether it is worth 38 cents a year to obtain the security of domestic sugar production at all times, including changes in international relations or trade, or even war, plus the profitable employment of a million farmers and the development of a sugar industry to employ perhaps a million more.

The purchasing power of the farmer determines the success of many factories and of the wage earners in the consuming centers. And the urban consumer depends upon the buying power of farmers.

So it is all an interlocking and interdependent nation-wide organization. Plain horse sense shows that any industry wiped out by a foreign competition dangerously damages every other domestic industry, and that American high standards and the welfare of the consuming public depends upon the protection of all domestic industry. The dust storm raised about a few cents on sugar, butter, beef, etc., is not for the benefit of the "consumer" but for the benefit of the importers who collect the toll and of the foreign capitalists whose investments are in these cheap labor foreign fields.

Protection of the farmer is a consumer's guaranty of continued employment, wages, and ability to pay, safety from foreign trusts and cartels, and, finally, a balanced national industrial fabric.

National self-sufficiency is national safety.

You can not be a consumer and not be a producer or the dependent of a producer.

These are thoughts that the consumers of America must know, fight for, and reverence.

Respectfully submitted by the undersigned organizations, representing growers of commodities mentioned in this communication.

FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative National Grange.
CHESTER H. GRAY,
Washington Representative American Farm Bureau Federation.
ERNEST BURGRULIES,
President Domestic Sugar Producers Association.
C. B. DENMAN,
President National Live Stock Producers Association.
A. M. LOOMIS,
Secretary the National Dairy Union.
C. E. DURST,
Secretary National Horticultural Council.

RADIO COMMUNICATION

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 102, making an appropriation for expenses of participation by the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications, to be held at The Hague in September, 1929, and agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 102, with a Senate amendment, and concur with the Senate amendment with an amendment. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill and read the Senate amendment, as follows:

To which the gentleman from Indiana moves to concur with an amendment, striking out "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$27,500."

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the Members of the House that this joint resolution passed this body several days ago carrying $35,000. It passed the Senate with an amendment reducing the amount to $20,000. Mr. Carr, of the State Department, says it will be absolutely impossible for us to participate in this affair as we should participate with that amount, but the department will try to squeeze through with $27,500. Inasmuch as this money is to be expended under the direction of the State Department, I think we should have no fear in giving them the authority. If they do not spend it they will not waste it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS CHESAPEAKE BAY

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 1535 be taken from the Speaker's table and considered by the House. It is a short bridge extension bill that came over from the Senate yesterday, and the Senator interested in it tells me that it is an important matter and ought to be passed now.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think it an emergency matter?

Mr. DENISON. On the statement of the Senator I would say, yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1535

An act to extend the time for the construction of the bridge across the Chesapeake Bay

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress, approved February 15, 1927, to be built by the Chesapeake Bay Bridge Co., a corporation, across the Chesapeake Bay, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE TRAILS OF COLUMBUS

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the gentleman from Porto Rico [Mr. DAVILA] made a unanimous-consent request, consent to which I objected. I understand now that these remarks that he wants to insert are the remarks of Congressman THATCHER, of Kentucky, and, following my usual custom, I will withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection. If there is no objection, the request of the gentleman from Porto Rico will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under the privilege accorded me therefor, there is herewith printed a very interesting and instructive travel story, written by Representative THATCHER, of Kentucky, formerly member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, and head of the Department of Civil Administration of the Canal Zone, which recently appeared in the National Republic, a magazine dealing with historical and patriotic subjects and published in the city of Washington. As the story deals with Christopher Columbus and the beginnings of American history, I have deemed it worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I have always been a great admirer of Christopher Columbus, and have ever held in the highest regard his epoch-making voyages and discoveries. From my earliest youth I have read with avidity the stories of his life and deeds; and, in point of outstanding achievements, tested by sequential results, I have fully shared the general judgment of mankind that the great Genoese navigator looms as one of the very largest figures of history. He molded destiny. His courage, skill, and vision combined to form a key which unlocked the most important material gateway known to the paths of human progress. In all truth he discovered a New World. His genius opened up to civilization the Western Hemisphere. Yet, because of the petty spirit of his associates and contemporaries, and of those for whom he so greatly wrought, he died in want and neglect. As is so often true of those who have accomplished great things for humanity, the passage of the years was required to bring about a just appraisal of his marvelous deeds.

The admiration and esteem I have borne for the great discoverer, and my regard for the character of his mighty achievements, have been increased—if that may have been possible—by reason of certain contacts which have been mine with various "lands of Columbus" in the regions of his epoch-making discoveries. Thus it was my good fortune to live for several years on the Isthmus of Panama, whose coasts, in 1502–3 on his fourth and last New World voyage, were touched and "cruised" by him, and where to-day, from sea to sea, the great Isthmian waterway, constructed by the skill and genius of our Republic, constitutes a strange but most realistic fulfillment of his dream of the discovery of the fabled passage from western waters to the Indies.

Referring to the Panama Canal, it is interesting to note that the two cities, lying side by side at its Atlantic entrance, bear in his honor the names "Cristobal," the American city, and "Colon," the Panamanian city. These appellations, as is well known, are, respectively, the Spanish equivalents for the English "Christopher" and "Columbus" of his name. Also, the beautiful little bay or harbor of Porto Bello, about 20 miles northeastwardly of the Canal's Atlantic entrance, and meaning, in English, "beautiful port," was so named by Columbus upon its discovery by him in 1502. From the quarries established by the Isthmian Canal Commission on its shores adjacent to the old Spanish-

Panamanian town of Porto Bello, there was procured the necessary stone for the concrete which formed the walls of the great locks of the canal at Gatun.

In addition to our life on the Isthmus, occurring during the construction of the Panama Canal (and with which great work I had the honor to have had some official connection), Mrs. Thatcher and I have visited various other lands and countries put on the map of the world by Columbus.

Thus we have been in Cuba, Jamaica, the Republics of Haiti and Santo Domingo (constituting the "Espanola" of Columbus), Costa Rica, the Virgin Islands, and Porto Rico (the only land discovered or visited by Columbus which is under the American flag, with the possible exception of the Canal Zone), and we have also viewed many times, on our voyages to and from the Canal Zone, that first bit of earth in the Western Hemisphere seen and touched by Columbus; that is to say, Watling's Island, the Guanahani of the aborigines; and by him christened "San Salvador." Also in March, 1927, on a visit to the oldest city in the New World—Santo Domingo—founded in 1496 under the direction of Columbus, we were permitted to see and in reverence to view, there in the ancient cathedral, the reputed remains of the great navigator and discoverer. Also there in the tower of the ancient Homenaje, or Castle of Santo Domingo, we were privileged to enter and examine the identical dungeon room wherein Columbus in chains, by order of the infamous Boabdilla, commissioner of the Spanish Crown, was imprisoned in the year 1500. As such prisoner, yet in irons, he was sent back to Spain, where, upon his arrival, following a great outburst of popular indignation and the sense of outrage experienced by Queen Isabella, he was, by royal direction, released and invited to the Spanish court at Granada.

Therefore it was but natural that we should long entertain the hope that some day we might be able to visit that ancient and picturesque Spain under the auspices of whose sovereigns the marvelous discoveries of the great Christopher were made, and that we might there look upon some of those spots and regions rendered forever sacred by his contacts during the troubled years preceding and following his great voyages. The desire thus to journey through the lands of Ferdinand and Isabella was heightened by the fact that by reason of our Isthmian life Mrs. Thatcher learned to speak with fluency the Spanish tongue, and I acquired some understanding of it; and we believed that by reason of this we would be able to secure in Spain much valuable information, not only as regards the haunts and deeds of Columbus there, but also touching other matters as well; and that we should be able to reap the greatest possible pleasure and benefit from such a journey.

Thus it came to pass that on the morning of May 21, 1927, the wife and I, accompanied by friends and fellow travelers, Mr. and Mrs. Frank C. Henry, well-known people of Washington, left Paris by train for a tour through Spain by way of the lovely seaside resort, Biarritz, in southern France. Biarritz lies just north of the French and Spanish boundary line, which here pushes itself through the rugged Pyrenees into the Atlantic Ocean. The date is mentioned, not that it means anything whatsoever so far as the writer and his companions on this journey might be concerned, but for the reason that it was made historic and immortal, because shortly after nightfall of that day there was completed at Le Bourget, upon the outskirts of the French capital, the most noted trans-Atlantic crossing ever known to the world—save one. At about the hour of 10 that evening, on this the most famous of the earth's air fields, Lindbergh, the "Lone Eagle of the Skies," in the little Spirit of St. Louis, calmly dropped down to earth and completed his epoch-making, nonstop, solo flight across the Atlantic seas, begun 33 hours before at Roosevelt Field, on Long Island, N. Y. Within an hour or two afterward, at Biarritz, in the Hotel du Palais, once the home of the third Napoleon and his lovely bride, the Spanish Princess Eugenie, we received by radio the amazing intelligence that this midwestern youth, whose adventure had been looked upon as a piece of monumental folly, had achieved the utterly impossible by making the indicated flight from New York to Paris. He had negotiated the long and trackless voyage with all the skill and instinct of the most tireless and lone-flying bird of the air. As a result, all France went wild that night, and remained wild for many a day thereafter. Not only had Lindbergh performed the impossible, but in France, during the period which followed his arrival there, his good sense and modesty seemed to win all minds and hearts; and, under the tactful and genial counsel of the late Ambassador Herrick, his wise and manly course, backed by the prestige of his great achievement, did more, perhaps, to strengthen the faltering bonds of friendship between our own and the French people than anything which had occurred since the close of the World War.

Very naturally those of my own little party were very proud and happy over the great feat performed by this splendid American youth. Some days before we had arranged our traveling schedule so as to leave Paris that morning; and with the whole world shaking its head in pitying skepticism touching the ability of Lindbergh to land anywhere except in a watery grave, we hardly felt justified in changing our plans and remaining longer in the French capital, because of the apparently futile hope that this greatest miracle of the air would be wrought by him.

So, after a short sojourn in charming Biarritz, with short motor trips into the surrounding Pyrenees and the Basque region, we resumed our carefully planned journey to the southward and plunged into the north of Spain, bound for the Spanish capital, and traveling by the Madrid express.

SOME COLUMBUS CONTACTS IN NORTHERN SPAIN

In what is to follow, reference will not be made to the actions and experiences of Columbus in any chronological order, but they will simply be pointed out or commented upon as the places where they respectively arose, were visited by the writer and his party, and as the association or connection of Columbus with these places may suggest.

Thus the first point of such contact which we encountered on our journey to Madrid was Burgos, in north-central Spain. Here we ran into a Spanish trail of Columbus. Burgos, once the capital of old Castile, and now the capital of the Province bearing the same name, is a quaint old city, famous for its great cathedral, whose construction was begun in 1221, and which constitutes one of the finest examples of Gothic architecture in the world. The city also holds the tombs of the famous Cid, the national hero of Spain, and Don Fernando, both of whom were natives of Burgos and celebrated for their great exploits in the Moorish wars.

But for the purposes of our story the city is especially renowned because of the fact it appears that here Columbus, in 1496, upon the return from his second and rather disastrous voyage to the New World, came to visit and submit to his sovereigns a report of the voyage. The reception he received at their hands, however, was quite different from what he had anticipated; for, as Irving records, although he approached them in a spirit of despondency, fearful of the reception they would accord him, he was by them treated with distinguished favor.

He thereupon was emboldened to propose to the King and Queen a further voyage of discovery, and they promised to furnish him with six ships for the purpose. Ferdinand, however, as was typical of all his dealings with Columbus, soon became cold and indifferent, and it was only because of the zeal, vision, and sympathetic interest and aid of the good Queen Isabella, who was always his loyal friend and the patron of his enterprises, that he was finally enabled, after a long, heartbreaking delay, to undertake this, his third great voyage, with the required squadron of vessels under his command, and which sailed on May 30, 1498, from the port of San Lucar de Barrameda at the mouth of the Guadalquivir River on the Atlantic coast. It was on this voyage that, in addition to discovering the island of Trinidad, he beheld for the first time, and discovered, the mainland of America. This was in the delta region of the Orinoco River along the shores of present-day Venezuela.

From Burgos we continued our journey to Madrid, and about 60 miles farther to the southwest we reached Valladolid, and there came upon another haunt of Columbus. In this old city, in ancient Castile, holding a population of something like 80,000, long a royal seat and the birthplace of Philip II, Columbus died. As is so often true in matters affecting the dates and places of the birth and death of the world's most illustrious sons and daughters, in the course of time there arise conflicts of historical authority regarding them. Thus we have the familiar illustration that Homer is said to have at least seven reputed places of birth, and we know that in the case of Columbus more than one place has claimed to be his birth site and more than one race or country has claimed him as a son. In addition, at least two places claim to hold his sacred dust, Santo Domingo and Seville. However, as regards the place of his death, there seems to be no dispute over the fact that Valladolid is entitled to hold this honor; and it seems to be also equally agreed that May 20, 1506, was the date on which his death took place. Here the great voyager, "home from the sea," denied the honors and benefits which were so justly his due, in despondency and humiliation, though in resignation and reverence, at the close of his stirring and eventful life, yielded up to its final account the proud, indomitable spirit which had enabled him, through deeds of lofty vision and noble adventure, to change the whole course of our human history.

Here also in this city is to be found the identical place where Columbus died, as well as the house in which, for several years, Cervantes, the great author of Don Quixote, lived. It appears that no spot has been authenticated as the first burial place of Columbus, though tradition has it that the Church of Santa Maria de la Antigua, in Valladolid, was the site. It seems to be well established, however, that at some time prior to the month of March in the year 1509 his remains—almost as restless in death as was his body in life—were brought from Valladolid to Seville and there deposited in the Chapel of Santa Ana in the monastery of Las Cuevas; and there they seemed to have remained until some time between 1536 and 1547 (different dates being assigned by different historians), when, by royal decree, as well as by what is said to have been the desire of Columbus himself touching his final resting place, they were removed to Santo Domingo and there interred in its cathedral.

From Valladolid our course lay, by rail, 100 miles or more southeastwardly to Madrid, where, late at night in the midst of a crowded fiesta season, we arrived. Here for several days we made our headquarters, seeing this lovely capital, which holds a million people; its royal palaces, its beautiful parks, and its galleries of great paintings and other works of art. From Madrid we ventured forth upon a delightful excursion over the great mountain plateau surrounding the city, the Plains of Castile, to visit such places of historic and scenic interest as the Escorial, the greatest palace of Spain, and containing the beautiful Spanish pantheon, Spain's royal burial place; La Granja, a smaller palace, with very beautiful grounds and a system of fountains comparable to those of Versailles; and Segovia, the old walled city that was adult and important in the time of the Roman occupation at the beginning of the Christian era. Segovia is also famous for a number of other things, among them being the world-renowned ancient Roman aqueduct, one of the most remarkable pieces of engineering architecture ever known, constructed of small granite blocks without mortar or cement, with double arches at certain points running as high as 100 feet above the earth, and the whole in excellent condition, and yet serving its original purpose of conveying into the city its water supply. Segovia is also widely famed for its noble cathedral, one of the finest pieces of the late Gothic art anywhere to be found, and its lovely and regally situated Alcazar, or fortress castle.

Also, in Segovia we found another Columbus contact. Here, in the spring of 1505, after the death of his friend and benefactress, Isabella, in November before, in the extremity of sorrow, weariness, and broken health, he came to the Spanish court seeking at the hands of Ferdinand the restoration of the rights and dignities to which, by virtue of his discoveries, he was entitled, and of which he had been so cruelly and wrongfully despoiled. He particularly sought the restoration of his former high office as "Viceroy and Governor of the Indies," originally bestowed by reason of his compact with the Spanish sovereigns, and earned because of his great achievements which followed. The visit, however, was unavailing. With the Queen forever gone, all of the appeals of Columbus for justice were ignored by Ferdinand. Finally Columbus, now in failing health and in the greatest dejection, from his bed of affliction addressed a last petition to the King, imploring that his son Diego might be appointed to succeed to and receive the rights of which he, Columbus, had been so unjustly deprived. This appeal, too, was treated like the others made by Columbus in his own behalf. Not long after this, as has been already shown, his death occurred in Valladolid.

In Madrid are to be found in the museums and libraries many very interesting and notable documents, paintings, and souvenirs of the voyages and discoveries of Columbus; but for the purposes of this narrative it is not deemed necessary to make any detailed reference to them.

On the 26th of May, by morning train we left Madrid for Seville, the capital of lovely Andalusia, three hundred and fifty-odd miles to the southwest, where we should come into the very heart of "Columbus Land." An all-day trip it was, and rather warm, but, nevertheless, most interesting. It led us through the famous Cervantes country, through the city of his birth, and through some of the scenes rendered immortal by the great author in Don Quixote. A number of ancient windmills we saw in this section. They are said to be those which the "Knight of the Rueful Countenance" was pictured as having attacked in some of his mad forays. On, through ancient Moorish Cordova we sped; then down the Guadalquivir River; and finally we brought up at Seville, the "Sevilla" of the Spanish, to-day as quaint and charming as it has been time out of mind, and holding, as does also Cordova, for the student of the life and deeds of Columbus, much of interest, as will be later shown.

PALOS AND LA RABIDA

After we had seen something of Seville I sought to arrange a trip for our little party from Seville about 90 miles westwardly to certain obscure, but greatly historic, spots clustered along a certain strip of the Atlantic shore in southwestern Spain, at the junction of the rivers Tinto and Odiel, and which, above all others in Spain, it was our desire to see. When I made inquiry at our hotel in Seville, and particularly of the concierge there, as to how far it was to the indicated region and how one might best reach it, I found it difficult to secure any satisfactory information upon the subject. The locality inquired about was not to be reached by rail, and seemed to be off the beaten paths of travel; and evidently comparatively few travelers ever go there, although it should be a veritable Mecca for those of the American countries. For years I had dreamed of seeing these places, and had hoped that some day this privilege might be mine. Now I was very near them, yet it was not easy to secure the definite, reliable information required to enable me to visit them; at least to visit them in the expeditious manner which our schedule required. This seemed a little strange, and when, later, I noted that except for an unfinished monument at one of the spots, there appeared to be there no adequate memorial to mark any of them, I was rather confirmed in the thought that, as regards these places—where it may be fairly said the history of America began—not only had the Spanish people been derelict in giving them proper memorialization, but the American people as well. But of this, more hereafter.

However, through continued inquiries and a study of Spanish maps I concluded that the roads were fair, and that the automobile would constitute the best means of travel to these points. The concierge having named what seemed to be an exorbitant charge to have us carried thither by car, I went into the street, much to his apparent disgust, and upon inquiry found a native chauffeur, an intelligent and honest-appearing young fellow, who assured me that he knew the way to the indicated section, and in response to my questionings gave evidence that he knew. He offered to carry us over and back for a sum which was quite reasonable, and much below that asked by the concierge. Thereupon I engaged this driver, notwithstanding the insistence of the concierge that the man knew nothing about the route, which was difficult to find, and would never be able to get us to the points of destination.

And so it came about that on the morning of May 28, we set out on this little journey from Seville by automobile—an American car—for the Atlantic coast. We motored over fairly good roads, though poorly marked, and through a pleasing farming and grazing country. After several hours of travel, and much winding about, we reached and crossed the Rio Tinto near the sea, and knew that we were on the right track and should soon reach our goal. This historic stream is thus named because its waters are deeply tinted or dyed with the washings of iron and copper ores abounding in its upper reaches, where there are important mines.

And what was the goal? La Rabida and Palos; the convent of La Rabida and the port of Palos, and the towns of La Rabida and Palos! How thrilling was the realization that very soon we should see these places which were rendered immortal and forever sacred by what transpired there centuries ago; places which should be held in profound reverence and regard by every man, woman, and child of the western world. La Rabida and Palos! How the mention of these names brought to mind the trials, the sufferings, the sublime courage and faith, the marvelous vision, the indomitable will, the wise plannings, the triumphs, and, again, the sufferings, of Christopher Columbus! We should soon see the spot where timely sympathy and aid came to him in his darkest hours, and which resulted in the indispensable support accorded by the Queen of Castile and Leon for his great undertaking! Shortly we should look upon the identical shore and the identical little harbor from which he sailed, on that epoch-making day 435 years before, into an unknown and terrifying sea, to negotiate the first authenticated, and the very greatest, crossing of that sea which has ever been made; and to discover on its western marge a New World which, in the fullness of time, should become the last, best hope of our humankind! And soon we should see in this same little harbor the spot to which, a few months later, in triumph he returned; thus completing with success the most wonderful maritime enterprise of history!

Not long after we crossed the Tinto River we came to the town of Palos, and we felt that we were entering upon holy ground. The place is now designated on the Spanish maps as Palos de la Frontera, though in the time of Columbus it appears to have borne the name Palos de Moguer. It is a quaint and typically Spanish village, and stands upon an elevation about a mile from the sea, or broad tidal mouth of the Tinto, wherein lay, in the old days, the anchorage of the port of Palos. The city of Huelva, a thriving little center, lies across the way between the Tinto and the Odiel Rivers, just north of their confluence at the sea.

Stopping at Palos only long enough to confirm our bearings, and expecting to stop here again on our later return, we drove on westwardly about 3 miles when we came to another little town very much like Palos. This was the village of La Rabida. Securing further information here, we drove a short distance beyond and were thrilled to see, at last, standing before us upon a lofty eminence overlooking the sea, and outlined with cameolike distinctness in the clear sunshine, and beneath the blue canopy of Andalusian skies, the little convent of La Rabida. Here to-day this ancient institution, dedicated to Santa Marie de la Rabida, is conducted by Franciscan friars in the same manner as it was conducted centuries ago when, within its quiet walls, the destiny of the New World was determined.

Making our mission known, we were received into the convento, or convent, with the finest spirit of hospitality.

The guardian of the convent was P. Fr. Leon Vence, a sturdy, genial "padre," who bade us welcome and assured us that every opportunity would be given us to see the institution and its grounds, and that there would be pointed out to us everything of interest; especially everything that related to Columbus. Thereupon, accompanied by one of his associates, he conducted us through the building and showed and explained to us, in his excellent Spanish, the various features of historic value.

VISIONS OF THE PAST

But before going any farther let us visualize the past for a moment. It was to the gate of this little convent that, on a certain day in the last quarter of the fifteenth century, there came a man, of rugged, noble aspect, accompanied by a little boy. Both were very tired and weary. The man asked for bread and water for the child, and, perhaps, as some historians relate, a bed for himself and the child. While the man was talking with the porter at the gate, the guardian of the convent, Fray (Friar) Juan Perez de Marchena, appeared, and noting that the man was both a stranger and a foreigner, entered into conversation with him and inquired as to his identity. The conversation elicited the fact that the stranger was one Christopher Columbus, and that the boy was his son, Diego. The stranger also confided the story of a great hope and dream, long cherished by him, of voyaging to the westward across the vast and unknown Atlantic, then known as the "Ocean-sea," to find upon a rounded globe, undiscovered lands and a far-off western shore—the Indies. Also, the information was vouchsafed by him that after years of effort he had been unable to secure a royal patron and protector, and the required assistance, to enable him to venture forth upon this mighty enterprise; that all his efforts had come to naught; and that, in consequence, he was in a state of great dejection. Columbus also made known the fact that he was on his way to Huelva to leave his son there with his sister-in-law.

Friar Juan Perez had been the confessor of Queen Isabella; he knew her well and possessed her confidence. He became interested in the story of Columbus and invited him to remain, with his child, in the convent for a time. The invitation was accepted. Friar Juan Perez thereupon summoned from near-by Palos one Garcia Hernandez, a young man, a student of astronomy. The friar not only was distinguished for his kindly, sympathetic spirit, but he was also a man of wide experience and generous outlook, and he had an excellent general knowledge of nautical and geographical matters. A conference was held, participated in by at least these three. Columbus stated his case with such clarity and persuasive force that Friar Juan Porez and Hernandez became convinced of the feasibility of his project. The good friar thereupon communicated with the Queen, and he enlisted—or, perhaps, confirmed—her sympathetic interest in behalf of Columbus and his enterprise.

In consequence there was arranged for Columbus an audience with Isabella, with the result that ultimately under her royal patronage, and with her influence and aid, three small vessels—the Santa Maria, the Nina, and the Pinta—were assembled at the port of Palos and manned and outfitted there; and on Friday, August 3, 1492, Columbus thence sailed with them on that memorable "First Voyage."

Washington Irving, in his history of Columbus, gives the year of this coming of the great discoverer to the convent of La Rabida as 1486, after he had unsuccessfully sought for his project the aid of King John of Portugal. Irving further relates that Columbus, after nearly seven years of fruitless effort in seeking the assistance of the Spanish sovereigns, weary and depressed, returned again to the little convent of La Rabida preparatory to leaving Spain and again appealing to a foreign power for aid; and that Friar Juan Perez, yet guardian of the convent, once again made intercession with Isabella, who thereupon had Columbus to visit her at the Spanish camp near Granada, and who, after the surrender of that fair city by the Moors, agreed to the terms proposed by Columbus, offered the pledge of her jewels for his undertaking, and procured for him the necessary means which enabled it to be entered upon.

So eminent and modern a historian as John Boyd Thacher, in his monumental work, Christopher Columbus, while fully confirming the general facts of the La Rabida story, just indicated, mentions but one visit of Columbus to the old convent, and fixes its date at the close of the year 1491, shortly before Isabella finally determined to furnish him the needed assistance for the great undertaking. Thacher further urges, upon historical authority, that the terms proposed by Columbus were accepted by the Spanish sovereigns shortly before, rather than after, the fall of Granada.

Regardless, however, of whether or not Don Cristobal ever visited the quaint little La Rabidan convent more than once, the fact is fully authenticated that he did visit it in the closing days of 1491; that he remained there for some time, and that its worthy prior or guardian, the aforesaid Friar Juan Perez de Marchena, made the arduous journey to the Spanish court camp at distant Sante Fe, near Granada, and there effectively enlisted the support of the Spanish Queen in behalf of Columbus. In Granada, then under a state of siege, the Moors in their last and greatest stronghold, were making a final desperate stand against the Spaniards. During the seven years next before the indicated date, Columbus, penniless and in direst straits, had followed the Spanish court from city to city, and from camp to camp, during the fierce, war-to-the death, Spanish-Moorish campaigns, and had vainly sought to secure for his proposal the approval of the Spanish sovereigns. With but few exceptions the dignitaries of church and state, and the so-called men of learning, to whom the matter was submitted by royal reference, throughout these anguished years, had denounced it as visionary and heretical. During a previous period of similar heartbreaking experiences, covering something like 14 years, say, from 1471 to 1485, Columbus, in Portugal, had vainly sought to secure the aid and sponsorship of the Portuguese Crown in the same behalf.

As a result of the indicated visit of Friar Juan Perez to the Spanish court at Santa Fe, Queen Isabella, with sympathetic concern, directed that Columbus should immediately repair from La Rabida to the court for further conferences touching his great project. The Queen, being mindful of the impoverished condition of Columbus, arranged to have him provided with a mule for his journey—this being an accustomed method of transportation in the Spain of that day, and not altogether abandoned at the present time—together with sufficient funds to defray the expense of the trip. Thereupon, in December, 1491, Columbus sallied forth from the convent of La Rabida, traveling over the same road, or a portion of it, at least, over which we had come by motor to La Rabida. He journeyed to the Spanish court at Sante Fe, where the terms of his proposal were accepted, and the compact embodying the same was afterwards signed by Ferdinand and Isabella.

In the convent we were shown the room or chamber where Columbus, Friar Juan Perez, and Garcia Hernandez held their memorable conferences, and where, it is believed, these three were joined in these discussions by Martin Alonzo and Vincente Yanez Pinzon, of Palos. Martin Alonzo and Vincente Yanez Pinzon, as is well known, were brothers. They possessed considerable experience as practical navigators, and were men of affairs and means. They readily entered into the spirit of the great enterprise proposed by Columbus, and their action and example largely aided in securing the enlistment of the necessary crews in a venture which, to the people of Palos, seemed destined to end in the most terrible disaster. Martin Alonzo was made the commanding officer of the Pinta, and Vincente Yanez the commanding officer of the Nina, while Columbus commanded the little squadron from the flagship, the Santa Maria, the third and largest vessel.

There was pointed out to us the identical cell or room occupied by Columbus and little Diego during their stay at the convent. On the second floor of the convent building there was exhibited to us an ancient ink horn, or well, which was said to have been used by Columbus during his stay at the convent. Into this horn we dipped our pens and wrote our names in the visitors' register. No other authenticated relic pertaining to the great discoverer seems to have been preserved in the convent.

Finally we passed from the convent to the grounds overlooking, to the north, the broad estuarial waters forming the confluence of the Odiel and Tinto Rivers. Two or three hundred yards eastward of the convent there stands a tall memorial or monument to Columbus. It was erected in the year 1892. It has never been fully completed, and is said to be in a somewhat dangerous condition. Friar Leon Vence, in speaking of the monument and of its unfinished state, laughingly said, "Señor THATCHER, si felizmente llegase el dia en que ese monumento se termine, sera porque los Americanos se encarguen de hacerlo, pues ellos tienen el dinero"; that is to say, in English, "Mr. THATCHER, if the monument is ever completed you Americans will have to do it, as you have all of the money."

Speaking of monuments, and referring to what I have already said touching the lack of adequate commemoration of Columbus and his great contacts with La Rabida and Palos, it is a matter of gratification to note that recently there was completed and unveiled on the Palos coast a giant monument of him, executed by Mrs. Gertrude Vanderbilt Whitney, the well-known sculptress, of New York. The cost of the work was borne by Americans. Thus, tardy, though fitting, memorialization of the great navigator and discoverer is being made at Palos. In addition, the unfinished monument at the convent of La Rabida should be fittingly completed, or else it should be razed and another appropriate memorial there erected in honor of Columbus, and in commemoration of the epoch-making events transpiring there in those fateful days near the close of the fifteenth century.

Also, any such work should include, or there should be separately erected, an adequate monument or memorial to Friar Juan Perez de Marchena to commemorate the great and invaluable part he played in this great world drama; and in according this long-delayed recognition the peoples of the two Americas should take the leading part.

Finally, after thanking our genial hosts for the splendid courtesy extended us, and bidding them "adios," we climbed back into our car and retraced the road to Palos. Stopping en route in the village of La Rabida long enough to view some interesting street scenes there, we soon pulled up at Palos. Here, as at the village of La Rabida, the children immediately gathered about us as thick as flies, climbing on the running boards of our automobile, and started a bombardment of high-pitched conversation in "Espanol."

In historic Palos is to be found the little Church of St. George, where Columbus came from time to time to worship, especially the night before setting forth on his memorable voyage on August 3, 1492; and also just after his return from that voyage. Whatever may be said touching the imperfections of Columbus—and he undoubtedly had his fair, human share of them—he was a devoutly religious man, as is fully revealed by any study of his life and achievements.

THE PORT OF PALOS

In Palos we made inquiry as to the precise spot from which Columbus sailed to discover a new world. Our chauffeur, who had brought us safely through to Palos and La Rabida, had never been to the seashore at Palos, which lay but a short distance away, and was not sure of the exact spot from which Columbus had sailed. However, a very precocious youngster, one of the swarming group of Palos urchins, volunteered to go with us about a mile to the shore, where, he said, we would see the actual place of embarkation. With our little guide perched on one of our running boards, we entered an unimproved roadway and soon reached the coast. There we found some adult natives, and they and our little guide pointed out to us the general anchorage whence the three small ships of Columbus were said to have sailed on that immortal expedition.

We were surprised to find no markings or memorials commemorative of that great event. An improvised fishing wharf was the only sign of improvement. Since, in the course of the centuries that have elapsed, there have been some changes here in the shore line through the encroachment and recession of the tidal waters, only the general roadstead of the old port of Palos could be indicated. Here we also looked across the estuarial reaches toward the open sea, and then northwardly toward the city of Huelva.

As Americans we could not but feel the deepest sense of awe and reverence upon viewing this sacred spot. There came before us the vision of that great day, centuries before, when the three little cockle-shells, under the command of Christopher Columbus and manned by superstitious and doubting crews, embarked upon the great adventure that brought the Old World to the New and the New World to the Old. From New York to Cherbourg our little party had voyaged on the Leviathan, a veritable monster of the deep, and in bulk, tonnage, and speed the equal, if not the superior, of any other vessel afloat. Yet that great craft at times has been known to struggle, as if for its life, in seasons of storm at sea. Compared with that mighty ship, the three frail barks of Columbus were as candles to the sun. Yet with those insignificant vessels the most skillful and adventurous navigator of his age was able to sail thousands of miles over trackless and unknown seas to accomplish his mighty purpose. Not only was Columbus a practical scientist, but he was also a superb seaman. His ability to weather out a West Indian hurricane gave ample proof of his seamanship. Undoubtedly his great skill enabled him to sail westward day after day upon that first great voyage, when horrified crews were mutinying and imploring him to turn back to Spanish shores. The members of those crews felt that without him, whether sailing eastward or westward, they could do nothing.

It will be recalled that by the royal decree of Ferdinand and Isabella, which bore the date, April 30, 1492, under some sort of pain or penalty, the town of Palos was required to provide for the forthcoming expedition of Columbus, and in behalf of the Spanish Crown, two small caravels, fully equipped and manned. These were the Nina and Pinta. The third, and largest vessel, was the Santa Maria, the flagship of Columbus. It was rented or chartered by the Crown, and was the only one of the three having a covered deck. To form some idea of the diminutiveness of these vessels, let it be recalled that the Santa Maria was of about 120 tons burden, the Pinta of 50 tons, and the Nina—the smallest of the three—of only 40 tons; and that the total number of persons carried by the three was about 100. Further comparing these little wooden sailing ships with some of our present-day giants of the sea—for instance, the Leviathan and the Majestic, each of more than 50,000 tons, each of steel construction, and driven by powerful engines; and each capable of carrying in passengers and crew four or five thousand souls, besides enormous cargoes and supplies—the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Nina must have seemed—as in fact they were—the tiniest and frailest of toys.

The general expense of the expedition, including the payment of the crews, was borne by the Spanish Crown, with the exception of a one-eighth contribution arranged for by Columbus. This was in pursuance of the terms of the compact or agreement entered into by him and the Spanish sovereigns.

As descriptive, in the language of Columbus, of the beginning of this great expedition, the following portion of the "Prologue" to his famous "Journal," describing this voyage in detail, may prove of interest here:

"I started from the city of Granada on Saturday, the 12th day of the month of May in the same year, 1492. I came to the village of Palos, which is a seaport, where I fitted out three vessels, very suitable for a similar undertaking; and I left the said port, well supplied with a large quantity of provisions and with many seamen, on the 3d day of the month of August in the said year on a Friday at the half hour before sunrise, and took my way to the Canary Islands of your highnesses, which are in said Ocean-sea, in order to set out on my voyage from there and sail until I arrived at the Indies."

It was also here, to these same waters at Palos, that Columbus returned on Friday, March 15, 1493, in the Nina, crowned with the success of his discovery of the New World. Here, upon that return, he and his men received the frenzied plaudits of the populace.

In this connection it may be interesting to note that although, in popular estimation, Friday is regarded as an unlucky day, it is, as has been aptly observed, a peculiarly American day. On Friday, August 3, 1492, Columbus sailed from Palos on his "First Voyage"; on Friday, October 12, 1492, he discovered land—the island of Guanahani—in the New World; on Friday, January 4, 1493, he left the island of Espanola—Haiti-Santo Domingo—on his return voyage to Spain; and on Friday, March 15, 1493, he arrived back at Palos. Hence, at least, so far as the beginnings of American history may be concerned, the sixth day of the week is entitled to our confidence and esteem.

Also, it is to be noted as a matter of historical interest, that to the port of Palos there came and landed in the year 1528, the famous "Conquistador," Hernando Cortez, after his conquest of Mexico.

As we gazed on these lonely shores and across these placid waters, the past, with all its mighty, striking events rose before us and filled our minds and hearts with its deep significance. There came the thought that except for what was done here in those epochal days, we, a few reverent Americans, who had journeyed to this shrine of shrines, would never have had any occasion to make this pilgrimage; nor might we have had any existence at all. It is true that God brings everything to pass in His own way and by His own means; and we are slow to comprehend His purposes; but how great a part does chance seem to play in the lives and fortunes of His children. In the fullness of time, it was inevitable that the Western Hemisphere should be opened up to civilization; but had the event been hastened or retarded, or brought about in any other manner than that which actually obtained, what would have been the effect on the present-day nations of America, and on the millions who to-day inhabit these nations? There and then, bringing the idea home to myself, I framed the mental queries: What would have been the effect of all this upon me? Would I have ever been existent in the world at all, except for the fact that because of this great voyage begun at Palos on that far-off day, there were set in motion, under certain circumstances and conditions, great currents of migration from the Eastern to the Western Hemisphere, with the result that, as one of the countless trifling sequences of all this I, at length, in the New World, came into life and being? Such thoughts and speculations are overpowering.

The afternoon was waning and we found it necessary to leave this immortal strand to return to Seville. We "kodaked" with reverent care some scenes of the Palos harbor; then driving back to the village of Palos, we dropped there our little guide, after "tipping" him to his satisfaction, and giving him our affectionate farewells. Thence, retracing the road of the morning, we sped back to the Andalusian capital, stopping here and there to observe, and to secure camera records of typical Spanish landscapes or settings; and, in due time, arrived at our hotel in Seville, quickened and inspired by the great contacts and experiences of the day.

SEVILLE RICH IN HISTORIC AND ARTISTIC INTEREST

Seville is situated on the Guadalquivir River—here a tidal stream—less than 60 miles from the Atlantic. The city is an important port and holds a population of something like 215,000. It is also rich in memories of the great navigator. Upon returning from his first voyage, Columbus came from Palos to Seville, and there stopped on his way to the Spanish court at Barcelona, where he gave an account of that voyage and his wonderful discoveries. The river flows through the city, whose main portion lies on the eastern shore. In the smaller portion lying on the west or right bank of the river is situated the Monastery of Las Cuevas, in whose Chapel of Santa Ana, as we have already noted, the remains of Columbus were brought from Valladolid, and there in this chapel they reposed until they were carried to Santo Domingo. Also, in this institution there were deposited, after the death of the "First Admiral"—the title bestowed upon Columbus—a large number of his more important papers. And to the city of Seville, broken in health and spirits, Columbus returned from his fourth and last voyage to the New World. Here he hoped to enjoy something of peace of mind and body, and to recuperate his health after his long years of anguished striving and cruel hardships; but his unfortunate fate yet pursued him. The restoration of his rights was denied him, and his sources of income were exhausted. His whole reliance was on Isabella; but now the zealous Queen was stricken with an illness which brought to a close her eventful life. Her death occurred on November 26, 1504, at the age of 54. The news of her passing proved a great shock to Columbus. She had been his best and noblest friend. Small hope had he henceforth of ever receiving the restitution of his dignities and benefits, or the fulfillment of the solemn promises made him on behalf of the Spanish Crown; and, as we have already shown, shortly thereafter followed his unavailing visit to Ferdinand at Segovia, and his death at Valladolid.

During this period, being detained in Seville by illness, Columbus was unable to deal with his sovereigns except by proxy. In this connection it is interesting to note that among the persons thus employed by Columbus at the time was Amerigo Vespucci, or Americus Vespucius, the Florentine, the man for whom it is supposed the Western Hemisphere was named. Christopher Columbus, the discoverer, and Americus Vespucius, the explorer, both of Italian birth, were close friends and companions. In a touching letter, written from Seville on February 5, 1505, to his son Don Diego, Columbus makes this reference to Vespucius:

"Diego Mendez left here Monday, the 3d of this month. After his departure I talked with Americus Vespucius, the bearer of this letter, who is going yonder where he is called in regard to matters of navigation. He was always desirous of pleasing me. He is a very honorable man. Fortune has been adverse to him as it has been to many others. His labors have not profited him as much as reason demands. He goes for me and is very desirous of doing something to benefit me if within his power."

Apparently there was no thought or suggestion of Americus Vespucius that the New World should be named for him rather than for Columbus. His voyages, commencing soon after the discoveries of Columbus began, and his extensive excursions along vast stretches of New World coast, coupled with his vivid stories of the explorations made by him in the same regions, fired the imagination of European scholars and scientists, with the result that the cosmographers came to designate on their maps the great region of the newly discovered lands as "America," in his honor. The name was euphonious and popular. It "stuck," and in time it came to be universally accepted.

In this connection it is also interesting to note that in Seville, on February 22, 1512, Americus Vespucius died.

Through the long years of appeal, and attendance upon, the transitory Spanish court, during the Spanish-Moorish wars, Columbus doubtless had occasion from time to time to visit Seville. Also, in all likelihood, he passed through the Andalusian metropolis on his way from La Rabida to the Spanish court before Granada in December, 1491, and on his return from that visit in the early part of 1492.

This is not the place to speak in general detail touching the manifold attractions, historical and artistic, of Seville. Aside from the features of interest bearing upon the life and achievements of Columbus, the city contains numberless treasures of appeal for the artist, the student, and the observant traveler. Numerous and striking evidences of the centuries of Moorish supremacy are to be found on every hand. Thus to be noted are the ancient walls (partly of Roman origin) surrounding the older city; the lovely Giralda, a noble steeple structure, rising to a height of 350 feet, erected centuries ago (1184–1196), as the prayer tower or minaret of the city's principal mosque, and now serving as the campanile, or bell tower, of the city's magnificent cathedral. Also near the cathedral is the old Moorish palace, the Alcazar. Though greatly transformed, and now a royal residence of Spain, it yet remains as a vital witness of the days when Mohammedan rule extended over the greater portion of the Iberian Peninsula. The place where Cervantes is said to have written Don Quixote is also pointed out to visitors, and constituted for us a feature of interest, as did also the house where Murillo, the great Spanish painter, died. In Seville was born, not only Murillo, but that other, and perhaps the greatest of all Spanish painters, Velasquez.

The great cathedral of Seville, Gothic in character, is one of the noblest and most beautiful pieces of architecture in the world. It covers an area second only to that of St. Peter's in Rome.

In the cathedral are to be seen many famous paintings and other treasures of art; but for students of the life and deeds of Columbus there are to be found within the vast, cooling glooms of the superb structure two features of especial interest. One is the tomb of Ferdinand, the second son of Columbus, with depictions thereon of the three caravels, with lateen sails, used by Columbus on his "First Voyage." The tomb also bears the famous inscription, "a Castilla y a Leon mundo nuevo dio Colon," the English rendering of which, as is well known, is, "To Castile and Leon Columbus gave a New World."

THE REMAINS OF COLUMBUS

The other feature is to be found in the south transept of the cathedral. It is the famous "Monumento de Colon." By the Spanish people it is believed to hold the remains of the great navigator and discoverer. Of all the memorials to the dead which we saw in Europe, this particular one appealed to me as being the most beautiful and striking. Four vital, youthful figures allegorical in character, representing the old Kingdoms of Castile, Leon, Navarre, and Aragon, bear upon their shoulders an impressive sarcophagus in which rest the alleged remains.

When I gravely suggested to our cathedral guide that, in the March before, I had seen the real, authentic remains of Columbus in the cathedral at Santo Domingo, he literally "went up in the air." "No, no, no," he exclaimed; "the real remains are here, and not at Santo Domingo!"

I believe, however, that it has been as conclusively established as any matter of this character may be that the actual remains of the great discoverer indeed repose in the little box, or urn, bearing thereon inscriptions of apparent authenticity, and lodged in the ornate tomb of Columbus in the old cathedral at Santo Domingo. I have seen both tombs, as well as the remains at Santo Domingo—some of the smaller bones and a few handfuls of dust—alleged to be those of Columbus; and I have read various treatises on the subject of dispute. The story in brief is this:

In 1795, when Spain ceded to France jurisdiction over the territory of Santo Domingo, the Spanish Government undertook to remove to the cathedral at Habana, in Cuba, from the cathedral at Santo Domingo, these remains. From an unmarked crypt or vault in the last-named edifice, certain remains, found in a metal box or urn, were so removed. All inscriptions thereon had been eroded by the processes of time. Because of the loss of Cuba, as a result of the Spanish-American War, the Spanish authorities, in the winter of 1898–99, removed from Habana to Seville these remains and placed them in the cathedral there in the tomb just described.

In the year 1877, however, during the repair of the cathedral at Santo Domingo, there was found another box, or urn, bearing every evidence of age and genuineness. The inscriptions found upon and within this box indicated that therein reposed all that was mortal of the "Discoverer of America," the "First Admiral," Don Cristobal Colon. Spain has never been willing to acknowledge that these were the true remains of Columbus, but stoutly insists that those that are authentic are in the cathedral at Seville. No question as to the good faith of the Spanish authorities in the indicated removal, so far as I can learn, has ever been made. The remains so removed—it is contended on behalf of Santo Domingo—were those of Diego, the son of Columbus. The mistake involved—if there was a mistake—under the circumstances, was a perfectly natural one. The controversy touching "Los Restos de Colon"—that is to say, "the remains of Columbus"—may go down the ages together with innumerable others of the same general character. I believe, however, if the remains of Christopher Columbus were ever placed in the cathedral at Santo Domingo at all—and the fact seems to be undisputed that they were—they have ever since remained there. The weight of historical and critical authority seems to favor this view of the matter.

Another object of great interest in Seville is the Golden Tower—"Torre del Oro," as the Spanish call it—thus named because to it there was conveyed from the New World practically all of the treasure received therefrom by Spain during the long period of Spanish conquest and occupation. The tower stands on the bank of the Guadalquivir, and from this spot the Spanish galleons, in the great days of Spanish New World supremacy, were dispatched, and hither they came laden with the spoils of conquest. Most of the ships now plying to and from the port of Seville find anchorage here.

Seville is just now making especial appeal to the world at large because there is being held there a great Spanish-American exposition, known as the Ibero-American Exposition of Art, Commerce, and Industry. In consequence, the city, for some time to come, will be a focal point of world travel. We saw the lovely exposition buildings—a number completed and others nearing completion—designed for administrative purposes and for the housing of the exhibits of the various countries; particularly those of Latin America and the United States. Spain is making every effort—and this important enterprise is in line with that effort—to restore her commercial and economic influence over the Latin-American countries, lost to her through her failure to govern them wisely in the days of her colonial greatness.

ANCIENT CORDOVA

From Seville we made our way northeastwardly back to Cordova, something less than 100 miles by rail. Cordova, long ago, was a very large city and a great seat of Moorish power. Its population, which in the ninth century is said to have run into the hundreds of thousands, is now about 80,000.

Like Seville, it is situated on the Guadalquivir River, and like Seville, also, a part of it is of Roman, and a part of Moorish origin. Its cathedral was originally a mosque erected in the eighth century, during the zenith of Moorish supremacy in Spain. It is famed throughout the world for its immense size—570 by 425 feet—its type of construction, and its bizarre interior. It was considered the most imposing religious edifice of its time. For a long period Cordova was the center of great wealth, splendor, and science under the western caliphs, and another Mecca for the Mohammedan world. It was conquered by Ferdinand III, of Castile, in 1236, and since that time has remained under Spanish dominion.

Cordova was one of the principal haunts of Columbus. Here, in the spring of 1486, the Castilian court was domiciled, and the Spanish sovereigns were deeply engrossed with their plans for the conquest of Granada. It appears that the first contact of Columbus with Ferdinand and Isabella, and with the leading dignitaries of church and state in Spain, was at Cordova about this time. The proposal of Columbus to sail westward into the great "Ocean-sea" to find undiscovered lands and to reach the shores of India, and there to establish contact and dominion in behalf of the Spanish Crown, as well as to promulgate the Christian faith, was received with astonishment and skepticism. In addition, the state of warfare existing between the Spanish and Moorish Kings, whereby all of the financial resources of Spain were taxed to the limit, added to the difficulty of Columbus in securing sympathetic consideration for his project.

Parenthetically, it may be stated that according to the most eminent historians, the actual cost of the "First Voyage," reckoned in United States coin, did not exceed $10,000; perhaps it was about $7,500. This sum, however, in that day would probably purchase ten times as much as it would purchase now, and would therefore be the equivalent of something like $75,000 under present-day conditions. Hence, in the light of modern American transactions, the total expense of that great expedition seems a very small, not to say inconsequential, amount; but during the closing years of the Spanish-Moorish struggle, it was no easy task, on the part of the Spanish Crown, to raise it. Judged, however, by the transcendent results which flowed therefrom, this little expenditure has proven to be the greatest investment of all time.

Learned conferences were held touching the proposals of Columbus, which for one reason or another were rejected; but with the persistency that ever characterized him, he continued to hope against hope. In want and neglect, and ofttimes the object of scorn and derision, he followed the migrations of the Spanish court through the years that ensued. Finally success crowned his efforts at Granada, in 1491–92.

These years had been spent by him in scenes of danger and adventure; and it is said that in one or more of the campaigns against the Moors he distinguished himself by his courage on the field of battle.

He appears to have been present at various sieges and surrenders of Moorish strongholds, according to his own testimony, and was present at, and witnessed, the surrender of Granada on January 2, 1492, by the Moorish King, Boabdil, to Ferdinand and Isabella, whereby the last vestige of Mohammedan power in Europe was destroyed.

During this period Columbus spent much of his time in Cordova, and there formed his historic attachment for Beatrix Enriquez, the mother of his son Ferdinand. Diego was the older of the two sons of Columbus. He was born of the marriage with Philippa Moniz, of Portugal, who died prior to or shortly after the date on which Columbus left that country for Spain, about the year 1486. Of Ferdinand it should be said that he bore his father's name with honor and distinction.

EN ROUTE TO GRANADA

Our next objective was Granada, famed in song and story throughout the world, and rich with memories of Columbus and his sovereigns. We learned that it was distant about 100 miles from Cordova, and that it could be conveniently reached by automobile over excellent roads through the loveliest mountain scenery. Our transportation thither was accordingly arranged, and after we had seen the points of outstanding interest at Cordova, we left that ancient city, and, in a splendid, brand-new American car, driven by a competent chauffeur-guide, we set forth. Southeastwardly, in undulating flight, we swept over the hills and mountains and across the valleys. The afternoon sun was considerate, and the landscapes which unfolded themselves in its clear light were of unsurpassed loveliness. In the lower reaches, to the right and left of us, in every direction, there stretched great vineyards and olive orchards; and here and there, in the midst of the green expanse of vineyard, or the gray depths of orchard, there flashed an occasional field of wheat, whose golden crop was being harvested by old-fashioned sickles in the hands of Spanish peasants, men and women. Once, in an upland field, we saw and photographed an interesting farm scene—that of two great plows being dragged through the dry soil by sturdy oxen, six yoke to each plow. The higher slopes and summits were soft in a velvety barrenness most pleasing to behold. On the way we encountered such places as Baena, Alcaudete, and Alcala la Real, standing, as is so often the case with Spanish cities and villages, on commanding heights, and each, in turn, usually dominated by a great, hoary castle, half in ruins, perched like an eagle on its crag. The sky lines thus presented are of the most impressive character.

Speaking of olives and grapes, we learned that the production and sale of these fruits were bringing to the people of southern Spain an excellent degree of prosperity.

As we drew near to Granada our roadway led us through Pinos Puente, greatly famed in tradition and story, and situated about 9½ miles northwest of Granada, on the Rio Cubillas. Here, so it is related Columbus came upon leaving the Spanish court at Granada, in the winter of 1491–92, as he believed, forever, because of the failure of the Spanish sovereigns to agree to the terms of proposal submitted by him for his great adventure. It is told that after Columbus had left the court with the purpose of journeying to France to lay his project before the French Government, Isabella, upon further consideration, concluded that his terms should be accepted and his expedition of discovery undertaken under Spanish sovereignty, and for the benefit and glory of the Spanish Crown; and that, accordingly, she dispatched a messenger to overtake him. It is said that the messenger caught up with him at the bridge across this little stream at Pinos-Puente, and communicated to him the request and command that he return to the court, where the compact would be accepted in the manner he desired. Thereupon—so the story goes—Columbus did so return, the compact was agreed upon, and he later went back to Palos and undertook the work of preparing for the "First Voyage." There is a painting depicting this purported scene, which hangs at the head of one of the stairways in the Senate wing of the Capitol at Washington. It is entitled, "Recall of Columbus," and was painted by the artist A. G. Heaton. It was completed in Paris, and was purchased by our Government in 1884.

Modern historians are inclined to discount the fact of this incident. Like many another story of Columbus, it is hard to distinguish between truth and fiction; and thus we are often led to recall the famous dictum of Henry Ford touching matters historical. Doubtless this particular story had some basis of fact. It certainly makes a very strong appeal to the imagination and is likely to endure. In any event it is believed that Columbus, upon his visits to the Spanish court at Santa Fe and Granada, journeyed along this road and over this bridge-way.

Speaking of Santa Fe, our course via Pinos-Puente led us within a short distance northwardly of Santa Fe, which lies 7 miles west of Granada.

Touching the matter of terms proposed and insisted upon by Columbus in his dealings with the Spanish sovereigns, and apropos of the suggestion, ofttimes urged, that Columbus thus showed himself to be selfish and grasping, it may be well to point out what documentary evidence seems clearly to establish. As great as was the zeal of Columbus to find new lands, and thereby to acquire for himself and sovereigns wealth and dominion, it appears that this was, perhaps, subordinate to an even greater purpose and ambition, that of instituting, or aiding in the institution of, another crusade or effort to wrest from the hand of the Moslem the Holy Sepulcher at Jerusalem. It is evident that by his voyages and discoveries he hoped to acquire riches and influence so that he might use them to this end; and thus, according to his sympathetic biographers, there is found a satisfactory explanation of his insistence upon the terms embodied in his compacts and agreements with the Spanish Crown, and his later demands that they be complied with. Confirmation of all this is to be found in his "Journal," as well as in his last will and testament, wherein he transmits to his descendants, as a task or legacy, the injunction to join, as a sacred duty, in such effort. From these documents it also appears that he hoped ultimately to enlist the influence and efforts of the King and Queen in the same behalf.

GRANADA, THE PEARL OF SPAIN

Granada, now a city of more than 100,000 inhabitants, contained a population of half a million at the time of the conquest of 1491–92. It has a regal situation, and it is, indeed, a "pearl of great price." No wonder that the Moors struggled so desperately to retain it. No wonder that the Spanish strove with equal desperation to secure it. Our first view of the city was from a revealing slope as we neared the end of our journey. There it lay before us, in striking relief, on the foothills of the Sierra Nevadas. These mountains, the loftiest in Spain, rose in snow-capped ruggedness just beyond, and to the southward. Upon the city's front there gleamed a great tawny jewel of oriental design, the Alhambra, famed throughout the earth for its noble beauty. This ancient Moorish castle-fortress is too well known to require laudation or description. After the conquest of Granada the Spanish sovereigns utilized it as a summer palace. Although marred by unsympathetic touches during the past three or four centuries, it nevertheless survives as the loveliest and most impressive combination of Moorish art and architecture to be found in Europe. World travelers speak of the Alhambra in much the same way that they speak of that masterpiece of memorial art, the Taj-Mahal of India.

In the Alhambra Palace we saw the various features of interest and beauty there to be noted, including the Hall of Ambassadors, or throne room, where Isabella and Ferdinand are said to have received Columbus on many occasions; Isabella's tower, the Court of Felicity, the Court of Lions, Room of the Two Sisters, the Moorish Baths, and the richly, unique mural and ceiling decorations for which the palace is noted. Its great towers, its massive inclosing walls, its interior loveliness, and its commanding elevation, all combine to cause the Alhambra to stand out in unexcelled beauty, majesty, and impressiveness. Also in the palace we visited the quarters occupied by Washington Irving when he was engaged in writing the Tales of the Alhambra, and other delightful stories inspired by his Spanish-Moorish contacts.

A short distance mountainward above the Alhambra, lies the "Generalife," with its avenues of giant cypress trees, its incomparable fountains, and its lovely grounds.

Not only did Columbus, in Granada, upon its fall see with his own eyes the Moorish King pay homage to the Spanish sovereigns and deliver to them the keys of the city, but he also had another important contact there. Upon his return, at the close of the year 1500, a prisoner in chains from his third voyage to the New World, by order of Ferdinand and Isabella he was released from custody and summoned to the Spanish court at Granada. It is told that when Isabella heard of the great wrongs which had been done him, she was filled with indignation, and Ferdinand joined her in disapprobation of these wrongs. By royal command Columbus was furnished with ample funds to defray the expense of his journey from Cadiz to Granada; and he appeared there at court, as an eminent historian relates, "not as a man ruined and disgraced but richly dressed and with an honorable retinue." By the Spanish sovereigns he was received with every evidence of distinction and regard. It is said that when the Queen saw him upon his arrival at the Granadan court, the contemplation of the cruel injuries which had been inflicted upon him by Boabdilla and his associates in "Espanola," moved her to tears, and that Columbus in turn was so deeply affected he broke down and wept.

Here he was able to vindicate himself of the false charges which had been preferred against him, and he was promised a restoration of the rights and dignities of which he had been deprived as a result of these charges. However, as we have already noted, such restitutional action was never taken.

The results flowing from the discoveries of Columbus were becoming so widespread and far-reaching that Ferdinand was unwilling for the rights, benefits, and authority touching these vast new regions, now coming under Spanish rule because of these discoveries, to inure to Columbus, as had been, at the outset, so solemnly agreed on. Ferdinand was a cold and crafty prince, though an able one. In the policy he thus pursued he was aided, abetted, and counseled by his chief advisers. Isabella, though desiring that justice should be done, and though doing ever so much to support and protect Columbus, was unable to remedy the essential wrongs that had been done him. The promises which Ferdinand was constrained to make always failed to ripen.

Columbus remained in Granada for the ensuing nine months in conference with Ferdinand and Isabella and the officers of state, during which period authority was given for his fourth and last New World voyage.

In the Royal Chapel at Granada we saw the tombs of Ferdinand and Isabella. Below their marble effigies we descended into the crypt where the candles eternally burn, and saw there the plain leaden coffins which contain their remains.

Also in the Chapel we saw Isabella's jewel case, reputed to be the veritable one which contained the jewels which she pledged, or offered to pledge, for the purpose of raising the funds necessary to defray the expenses of the great enterprise of Columbus. The required funds, however, seem to have been raised without the necessity of this queenly sacrifice. In the same section of the Royal Chapel we saw the crowns and scepters of Ferdinand and Isabella, and their sedan chairs. We were permitted to sit in the chair of Ferdinand, but that of Isabella was too frail to permit there being taken with it any such liberty.

The story of the lives of these two famous sovereigns of Spain is indissolubly bound up in that of Christopher Columbus, for, under their patronage and authority, and with the aid they furnished, he undertook and achieved his great voyages of discovery.

BARCELONA AND GENOA

But this story, already too long by far, must be brought to a close. Let us therefore hasten.

From Granada we returned to Madrid; and thence proceeded to Barcelona, Spain's largest city and greatest seaport. It lies on the Mediterranean, and its population is more than a million. It is a thriving metropolis, of combined ancient and modern aspects, and is very attractive and interesting. Here we saw under construction the buildings of another great Spanish enterprise, the International Exposition of Barcelona, which is now open. By this and the exposition at Seville, Spain is showing a highly ambitious spirit. In consequence, all international roads are at the present moment leading to Spain, and any traveler will be well repaid by journeying to and through this historic and picturesque land heretofore considered somewhat off the beaten paths of tourist travel.

We encountered here the last Columbus contact of our Spanish adventures. To the Spanish court at Barcelona in the spring of 1493, upon his return to Palos from his discovery of the New World, Columbus came. He was received everywhere along the way, and at the court, as well, as a conquering hero. Here, there was submitted by him to Ferdinand and Isabella the proposal for a second voyage of discovery; and here the proposal was accepted.

Columbus, whose star was now in brilliant ascendancy, with 17 ships, large and small, from Cadiz, on September 25, 1493, set sail on this second voyage.

From Barcelona we traveled northeastwardly into France, pausing at Marseille and Nice long enough to enjoy something of the exquisite loveliness of the French Riviera. Thence, we journeyed to Genoa.

Genoa, a city of about 350,000 people, for centuries has been a great seaport. Here we encountered the last haunt or trail of Columbus in Europe. It was the last, so far as we were concerned, but for him the first, for the reason that here, at some time between the years 1435 and 1446, he came into the world and was given the Italian name of Cristoforo Colombo. Here he spent his youthful days, and here he went to sea and became a skilled and adventurous mariner.

The point of greatest interest for us in Genoa was the little vine-covered stone house standing in the heart of the city, wherein Columbus is reputed to have been born, and which is duly inscribed. It is very old, and it was unoccupied and in quite bad condition when we saw it. We regarded it as another most sacred, historic shrine, and our travels would have seemed incomplete had we failed to visit it.

Of course the claims of other places as the birth site of Columbus have been advanced; but the weight of authority, including his own statements bearing upon the subject, seem to establish, with sufficient force, the fact that he was born in Genoa. He was the son of Dominicus Columbus—or, in Italian, Domenico Colombo—and his wife, Susanna Fontanarassa. As every school child knows, the father was a woolcomber—a worker in wool. The exact date of the birth of Columbus can not be determined; but it has been placed at varying times between 1435 and 1446, inclusive. Modern historians are inclined to accept the year 1446. In and adjacent to Genoa, Columbus spent his earlier years; and because of the city's important maritime interests, and its seafaring population, it was but natural that he should early have gone to sea and become a seaman.

The dwelling house we visited is pointed out by the Genoese as the actual birthplace of their great compatriot. It appears to have been his ancestral home; and this fact gives weight to the claim that here he first saw the light of day. The fame of the world's great is so often belated and posthumous in character, that it is inevitable that, in the course of time, many essential facts of their lives are difficult of establishment. Contemporary evidence, in matters of doubt, is entitled to the highest consideration. Thus guided, I accept the general judgment of history that Columbus was an Italian, and a native of Genoa.

This little house in the midst of busy Genoa may, or may not, be the actual birthplace of the great voyager and discoverer, but its modesty and humbleness certainly cause it to look the part. It might not be the character of dwelling which you and I, dear reader, might choose as the portal through which a mighty soul would make its advent into the world; but when we consider how the great of earth have so often come into mortal being in manger, hovel, and cabin, we must realize that the Author of All has His own purposes and processes in view in choosing such lowly premises as the birth spots of many of those who are to carry on His great work in the world. Therefore, we may well believe that this small, unpretentious structure was the place of nativity of one of the earth's most truly great, Christopher Columbus, discoverer of America.

THE GENTLEMAN FROM TEXAS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, no legislative body in the world appreciates so deeply and evaluates so accurately the ability, courage, frankness, justice, and fairness on the part of its Members in the discharge of their legislative duties as does this body. There are many on both sides of the aisle who meet such test, and because of this enjoy the confidence and affection of the entire membership of this body. Among that number certainly none is more deserving and outstanding than the gentleman from Texas, the minority leader, the Hon. JOHN GARNER. [Applause.]

An important bill considered at the present extra session has again very forcibly brought to mind these fine qualities of his, and I have felt that it might not be inappropriate just before we take a long recess to make brief reference thereto. His views as to a fair and adequate duty on the products of farm and factory have been well known for many years, and it so happens that when the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, without consulting the minority members, of which he is one, prepared and reported the tariff bill, it carried a very satisfactory schedule of duties on many products grown and produced in the district so ably represented by the gentleman from Texas.

The schedules carried on such products were in line with the views of a large majority of his constituents, and not at variance with what he felt such products of his district were entitled to. After the bill was reported Republican colleagues of his—some in jest and some in serious vein—were frequently heard to say, "Well, this is one bill which Republicans have so written as to make it difficult, if not impossible, for the gentleman from Texas to oppose." But the friends of GARNER knew then, and all the Members of the House now know, that his interest in, his analysis and study of a great tax measure could never and would never be confined and limited only to the tariff schedules affecting the products of his district. His speech in opposition to the bill was a forcible and memorable one, and I invite the membership of the House to again read it. It sounded the keynote of his statesmanship. In substance he said:

> While I have no fault to find with many of the schedules carried in the bill, yet this is a bill which I strongly condemn, because in the application of what to me is a great principle, the committee who wrote the bill have not been fair and just. There are many unfair discriminations.

Said he:

> I further condemn it because it violates one of the great fundamentals of our constitutional form of Government, in that it seeks to take from the legislative branch and to confer upon the Executive the taxing power.

Some of his objections to the bill were concretely set out in the motion to recommit which he offered and which commanded every vote on the Democratic side except one.

In conclusion, I have only this to add. It matters not on what side of the aisle you sit, nor how widely Members may differ in their conclusion with the gentleman from Texas, all are united in paying to him this just tribute: That ability, courage, justice, and fairness are the guiding stars that mark always his legislative service. [Applause.]

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1929.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Permit me to tender my resignation as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to take effect June 30 next. I sever connection with the Board of Regents with sincere regret, and in so doing want to express my appreciation of having had the privilege of representing the House of Representatives on the Board of Regents of that great and internationally known institution.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER H. NEWTON.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the acceptance of this resignation?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Chair appoints, to fill the vacancy, Mr. LUCE, of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

TO DETERMINE THE PROTEIN OF WHEAT

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago there took place in the House a debate with regard to the value of laboratories to establish the protein content of wheat. During that debate some questions were raised as to the form of the legislation which had been introduced and as to the value of these laboratories.

It so happens that a bill to this effect, introduced by Senator WALSH of Montana, has passed the Senate and that early in the session I introduced an identical bill.

There has now been received a report from the Secretary of Agriculture with regard to the House bill, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks further by printing the bill and the report in order that the House may be fully informed before this matter is taken up for consideration in the fall session.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill and report follow:

H. R. 2160

A bill to provide for producers and others the benefit of official tests to determine protein in wheat for use in merchandising the same to the best advantage, and for acquiring and disseminating information relative to protein in wheat, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known as the "Federal-State protein testing act"; and the word "Secretary," as used herein, means the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary is hereby authorized to establish, maintain, and operate protein-testing laboratories at such places as he may deem advisable and practicable for the official protein testing of wheat and the certification thereof and for and in connection with the other purposes specified herein. The Secretary is also authorized to have tests made in any such laboratory on the protein content of wheat of any year prior to or during the harvesting and marketing thereof, and he may compile and disseminate estimates based on such tests on the probable amount of protein in the wheat in any given area; and the Secretary is further authorized to collect and disseminate information for the benefit of all concerned pertaining to protein in wheat as a merchandising factor and relative to the conditions affecting the quality and quantity of protein in wheat and surrounding the marketing of wheat with respect to protein.

SEC. 3. That cooperative protein-testing laboratories shall be established, maintained, and operated whenever deemed practicable in cooperation with any State agricultural college meeting conditions prescribed by the Secretary or, in lieu thereof, with any other agency of a State with which cooperation is found practicable and desirable.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary is authorized to charge and collect fees fixed by him for any laboratory from persons requesting the performance of services under this act. In case a protein-testing laboratory is operated cooperatively, the Secretary shall prescribe the basis on which any fees charged and collected hereunder shall be derived upon payment between the cooperating parties. All money accruing to the Secretary as aforesaid shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. The Secretary is further authorized from time to time to make such regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act, and he may cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political suddivision thereof, or any person; and shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees not in conflict with existing law, and make such expenditures for rent outside the District of Columbia, printing, telegrams, telephones, books, publications, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to the administration of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $285,000 for expenditure during the fiscal years 1929 and 1930 for carrying out the purposes of this act, and the appropriation of such additional sums as may be necessary thereafter for carrying out the purposes of this act is hereby authorized.

JUNE 14, 1929.

Hon. G. N. HAUGEN,

House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. HAUGEN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 30, 1929, with which you inclosed copy of H. R. 2160, a bill to provide for producers and others the benefit of official tests to determine protein in wheat for use in merchandising the same to the best advantage, and for other purposes.

As you no doubt know, this is a matter of considerable importance to wheat growers. The bill as drawn is designed to care for two major activities; first, to provide for educational work among producers which will enable them to know prevailing conditions with respect to this highly important feature of wheat merchandising; and, secondly, to provide means whereby actual tests may be made and official certificates issued on specific lots of wheat.

I have given the bill very careful consideration and am of opinion that it is a distinct step forward in that it contemplates putting in the hands of producers of wheat with a high protein content, and which brings a premium when sold at the terminal market, information and facilities which will enable them to secure the reflection of such premiums to the producers who usually market their wheat at country points. This department feels that there is need for facilities which will enable the grower to know and to realize on the protein content of his wheat. The provision of such facilities has been undertaken by some States. Whether other provision should be left to the States is a matter for Congress. This department realizes the value of such testing laboratories and therefore indorses the principles of the bill.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR M. HYDE, Secretary.

Submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, pursuant to Circular No. 49 of that bureau, and returned to the Agricultural Department on June 14, with the advice that the expenditures contemplated by H. R. 2160 would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF A PORT AT BEAUFORT INLET, BEAUFORT-MOREHEAD CITY, N. C.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of waterway and port developments in the State of North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, North Carolina has probably more inland waters and waterways than any other State in the Union. It has two important ports, Beaufort Inlet, with its twin cities of Beaufort-Morehead City, and Southport-Wilmington, on the Cape Fear River.

Beaufort Inlet recently had its depth of water increased to 25 feet at mean low water, and a project is now pending before the United States Army Engineers for a 30-foot channel at mean low water. The possibilities of a great port at Beaufort Inlet loom large at this time. This port at one time was the principal port of the State, and large commerce was developed through it, not only of a coastwise nature but with the West Indies.

Beaufort Inlet is at present the southern terminus of the inland waterway from Boston.

It is contemplated that adequate terminal facilities will be provided at Pier 1, which lies between the twin cities of Morehead City and Beaufort, on the Norfolk Southern Railroad. For many years a pier belonging to the railroad supplied the needs of this port, but the railroad allowed the same to deteriorate and fall into disuse.

Feeling that it was a crying shame that this important port should remain unused I went before the Chief of Engineers, General Jadwin, together with certain shipping people and presented to him the needs of deeper water across the bar at Beaufort Inlet, and General Jadwin allocated a sufficient sum of money to make a depth of 25 feet at low water. With the deep water secured the next step was to secure the rebuilding of the pier at Pier 1 at Morehead City. The officials of the Norfolk Southern Railroad were approached, but they did not feel sufficiently the urge to replace the pier. I then drew an act for passage through the legislature to establish a port commission for Carteret County. Hon. W. H. Bell, the representative from Carteret County, secured the passage of this bill through the legislature. The act will be found in the Public, Local, and Private Laws, North Carolina, session 1927, chapter 245. One of the most important features of the act was the legislative declaration, as follows:

SEC. 11. That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the State of North Carolina to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facilities in connection with the commerce of the United States, and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation, and that Beaufort Inlet, N. C., is hereby declared to be a port to be developed in connection with the towns of Beaufort and Morehead City, and in connection with the interior of the State of North Carolina and other States, and that it is hereby declared and deemed by the State of North Carolina necessary and desirable and in the public interest of the entire State that there shall be established through Beaufort Inlet, through connecting water-and-rail rates in connection with shipping companies and other transportation companies, and in accordance with the provisions of the acts of Congress in the United States and the laws of North Carolina.

This legislative enactment is still the law, and the Port Commission of Carteret County has been organized, and this law provides the means for requiring the railroads, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, to give to a North Carolina port through connecting water-and-rail rates the same as now exists with the railroads through Norfolk, Va., and Charleston, S. C.

There is no logical reason why North Carolina commerce which is handled in ships should not pass through a North Carolina port instead of the ports of other States. And it is my earnest purpose to bring about this result by awakening the business interests of our great State. Let the slogan throughout the State of North Carolina be, "North Carolina commerce through North Carolina ports."

Very recently, at my instance, Mr. Henry Herberman, the owner of the American Export Line, operating 34 ships, flying the American flag, from this country to foreign ports, and Mr. J. F. Schumacher, who operates the Quaker Line from Philadelphia to the Pacific coast ports, made an inspection with me of the possibilities of Beaufort Inlet as a port. We went into every angle of the matter, and while these gentlemen were in North Carolina we called upon Gov. O. Max Gardner at Raleigh, and also visited the large business interests at Winston-Salem, Durham, and other points as to the possibilities of moving large quantities of tonnage by ships through Beaufort Inlet and by connecting rail from and to the interior of North Carolina. The results of this inspection and these conferences with the governor and the leading business people at these points caused Mr. Herberman and Mr. Schumacher both to assure me that they were ready to operate the ships through Beaufort Inlet to European ports and also to the Pacific coast ports as well as Atlantic ports. The governor of the State has promised his full cooperation in the matter.

The first step is to provide adequate terminal facilities. This seems assured with the aid and assistance of the Port Commission of Carteret County, the Norfolk-Southern Railroad, and the State of North Carolina, through its agency, the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad Co. Plans are now under way to bring about this result.

After the terminal facilities are established the next step is to secure through connecting water and rail rates. It would seem that the Norfolk-Southern Railroad and the Southern Railway, both lessees of State-owned east and west railroads, would heartily cooperate and join in this undertaking. So far they have not done so, although I have had numerous conferences with the officials of both roads looking to this desired end. The railroads can be required to make these through connecting water and rail rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is my hope that they will voluntarily do so without having to resort to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

No greater thing can be brought about in North Carolina for its future business development than the establishment of a great port at Beaufort Inlet with ships plying to and from foreign ports and ports on the Pacific as well as ports on the Atlantic seaboard.

I can not but believe that the railroads now operating through the Potomac yards, Washington, and Baltimore, to and from North Carolina and the South are bound to realize the impossibility of moving all the traffic by rail through this "neck of the bottle." The growing traffic is getting beyond the capacity of the railroads to handle and the ports of the South and the inland waterways will of necessity have to be developed and used. The Government is spending millions of dollars developing inland waterways. More than $9,000,000 has been expended on the inland waterway from Norfolk to New Bern, Beaufort, and Morehead City. Six millions of dollars will be expended upon the inland waterway from Beaufort to Wilmington, now under construction. The Chief of Engineers of the United States Army has recently approved the link of the inland waterway from the Cape Fear River to Charleston. It will not be long until we will have the completed inland waterway from Boston, Norfolk, New Bern, Beaufort, Morehead City, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, and Miami, Fla.

The great thing for North Carolina to do is to develop its ports, and most important of all at this time is the development of the port at Beaufort Inlet, which has such bright prospects for the immediate future.

PROHIBITION

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, the other day when I spoke on the floor, I got permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD. This permission does not appear in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that the correction may be made in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the RECORD with regard to false charges made against me by my colleague from Michigan, Mr. HUDSON, on the floor of the House Monday.

I am not surprised that Mr. HUDSON should attack me because of my objection to indiscriminate shooting by prohibition agents and the killing of innocent persons by them and that his discussion of the situation on the Detroit River should largely be a personal attack on me and my motives. Of course I did not refer to Mr. HUDSON in my own remarks on the House floor.

Mr. HUDSON was formerly connected with the Michigan Anti-Saloon League and has been a political enemy of mine during my public career. Every time I ran for office he and his organization, the Anti-Saloon League, joined with my opponents in Detroit in an effort to defeat me.

Monday on the floor of the House, according to the RECORD, he said:

> The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] who addressed the House a moment ago, not on the floor of the House but through the press of the country, made a statement to the effect that he was going back to Detroit to find out about the shooting of an innocent youth by a customs patrolman. Yet when he got to Detroit he found that that innocent youth, who he said was going down the river to catch pickerel at 1.30 o'clock in the morning, was one of a group that had just left a boat laden with 35 cases of liquor that had been abandoned at the approach of Government guards, and was then slipping down the river to find out whether he could not recapture the abandoned boat laden with liquor. He was not an innocent youth, as depicted in the newspapers. The report went all over the country that "a poor, innocent youth" had been shot. He was a rum runner.

This charge by Mr. HUDSON against me is absolutely false. I never issued an interview or made a statement before I ascertained the facts that young Eugster who was shot was or was not an innocent youth.

I went to Detroit mainly to find out whether the youth was innocent or not and if he was innocent I intended to take steps to prevent the whitewashing of his murderer, such as had occurred in the Benway-Neidermeier case which I personally investigated a few years ago. Judging by expressions on the floor of the House some Congressmen here, and many of the people of the country, believe that efforts are being made to whitewash the slayer of Wirkkula of International Falls.

I had issued a warning a few days before the killing of Eugster to the people of Detroit, and particularly to prohibition forces, that innocent men, women, and children would be in danger of injury or death during the prohibition drive. When I got to Detroit and found that the Eugster boy had been shot about 2 o'clock at night, my first remark was that it did not look as if he were entirely innocent, and that remark was printed in the newspapers. To prove that I did not prejudge this case I now read copy of a letter which I sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and the Acting Commissioner of Customs:

> I have just been advised that Archibald Eugster, age 21, was shot by Federal agents on the Detroit River yesterday. He claims he was fishing. When the agents opened fire on him one of the bullets entered his abdomen and he is in a Detroit hospital at the point of death.
> I hope you will immediately order an investigation, and if the preponderance of testimony shows that the agents were to blame I hope you will immediately suspend them pending the outcome of their trial. I have found that hair-trigger or drunken prohibition agents who have a tendency of shooting at innocent persons are very much afraid of suspension pending their trial.
> I know, of course, that you do not wish any innocent men, women, or children killed by Federal prohibition agents during the present drive on the rivers and lakes around Detroit.
> Very sincerely yours,
> ROBERT H. CLANCY.

My colleague, Mr. HUDSON, also charged on the floor that my wet speeches were made for political effect, thereby making the false imputation that I am not sincere and honorable in my opposition of the past few years to promiscuous shooting by prohibition agents and the murder of innocent persons. He also commended himself for his attitude on the wet and dry question. Of course, that sort of language carries its own refutation.

To offset these charges, I have to my credit about 16 years of sincere, honorable, and efficient service for the people of my district. During these 16 years I was a Federal official in the administrative or congressional branch of the Federal Government.

Merely in rebuttal and hoping it will not be considered an immodest statement I may say that I enjoy the affection and confidence of the people in my district as much as any other public official whom they elect to office. Every time I ran in an election I have led the ticket and that notwithstanding the fact that the efforts of men like my colleague, Mr. HUDSON, were concentrated upon me in an effort to defeat me.

AFFIDAVIT BY JACQUES

I, Louis H. Jacques, of Detroit, Mich., being duly sworn, do swear and affirm:

First. That on June 12, 1929, I resigned my position as a United States customs border patrol agent at the Detroit base. This was the day of the death of Archibald Eugster, Delray youth, who was shot down and died from bullets from the gun of Jonah Cox, a border patrol agent. I resigned my position, and so stated in a letter to customs headquarters at Detroit, because I could not remain connected with an organization which countenanced promiscuous shooting, such as that by Cox, and, secondly, because I was reprimanded by my superior officer after I had discussed the shooting with a fellow inspector.

Second. That the night of Cox's shooting of Eugster, I was in command of Cox on the river until midnight. During that time—at 10.05 to be exact—I was forced to command Cox to cease firing at a boat when his bullets, I felt, were endangering the lives of innocent citizens driving their automobiles over a highway bridge, beneath which was the boat at which Cox was firing.

Third. When relieved from duty on that night, I returned to the base and filed a report, censuring Cox for his promiscuous shooting on the river. This report was filed more than an hour before Cox's fatal shooting of Eugster. The following day when I went to the base, and heard of Cox's shooting, I remarked to a fellow officer that his fatal shooting bore out my report. I was overheard by another officer, and in accordance with the system of espionage in the border patrol at Detroit which requires every inspector to report everything done by his fellows, I was reported to my superior. The reprimand followed and that night I made my decision to resign.

Fourth. I further swear and affirm that my record in the border patrol was without a blemish; that I resigned of my own free will and accord as a protest against the conditions in the border patrol there, and that I have brought my story to Washington for the sole purpose of saving, if possible, the lives of innocent men, women, and children on the Detroit river, which, I feel, will be taken if conditions remain as they were in the concentrated prohibition drive being staged in and near Detroit.

Further deponent says not.

Signed this 18th day of June, 1929, in the city of Washington, D. C.

REMEDIAL LEGISLATION PROPOSED

I have to-day introduced four bills in the House, one providing for the legalizing of the sale of 2.75 per cent beer; another to repeal the Volstead law in its entirety; also bills making the practice of tapping telephone and telegraph wires by Government agents illegal, providing for the suspension of prohibition enforcement officers who shoot innocent persons.

My beer bill proposes to modify the Volstead Act by the substitution of a beer percentage which has been declared legal by Mr. Volstead himself, for he has asserted that cider or other beverages with a 2.75 per cent alcoholic content by volume is not intoxicating within the meaning of the dry law. The widespread scandals which have grown out of the existing dry law, the crime and disrespect for law which it has provoked, make it increasingly apparent that some modification to allow the legal sale and consumption of such a beverage as 2.75 beer should be authorized by Congress.

WIRE TAPPING TOO OFFENSIVE

I was prompted to present the wire-tapping measure by the recent activities in connection with the prohibition drive in Detroit when Government detectives are said to have tapped the wires of the home of Carey D. Ferguson, former collector of customs. Government detectives also shadowed Ferguson for many days and nights. Unless this practice is stopped prohibition agents may some day even tap the wires of the President of the United States.

When wires are tapped and the evidence thus obtained is used in court, it has the effect of making a man testify and give incriminating evidence against himself, which is contrary to the spirit of the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution of the United States. The Congress should protect the secrecy of telephone and telegraph messages and make them, when intercepted, inadmissible. It is contrary to the very principles upon which this Government is founded that evidence is obtained against a man by means of trickery, subterfuge, trespass, or fraud. To tap a man's wires is as bad as to break into his home or domicile to spy on his private life. Unless checked, prohibition spies will be next found under a public official's bed.

SUSPENSION OF BAD AGENTS

I have urged upon the Secretary of the Treasury that when the preponderance of testimony shows that a prohibition officer is guilty of wounding or killing an innocent person unjustifiably that the officer be suspended. Under the provisions of my resolution this suspension should be effective until it is clearly established that the officer is not guilty of such offense. My purpose in introducing it is to relieve the Government of the responsibility of providing legal counsel for agents who shoot promiscuously, and it separates them from the Federal pay roll while they are under suspension awaiting trial. Customs and prohibition agents above all fear suspension. They not only lose their pay while under suspension but also the prestige of having the United States Government behind them and the assistance of the district attorney's office and the Attorney General's office. I learned that through personal investigation of several prohibition shooting scrapes in Detroit during the past few years.

My resolution would, in effect, relegate an enforcement officer who wounds or kills an innocent person to the status of a Government officer under suspension making him virtually a private citizen and obliged to provide his counsel and pay the expenses for his defense himself.

DANGER STILL IMPENDS

Press reports from Detroit and Windsor to-day stating that the lives of two men and a woman in a speedboat in Canadian waters in the Detroit River were endangered yesterday when Federal officers opened fire on their craft and shattered it with bullets is not surprising to me. On the contrary it is exactly in line with my warning which I made before the present drive began. I declared that pleasure seekers, fishing and boat enthusiasts on the Detroit River were in for an ominous summer and I predicted that thousands of innocent men, women, and children would remain off the river for fear of their lives.

The officials at Detroit themselves say that there will be innocent shootings and yesterday's occurrence only bears out the truth of the statement.

MEETINGS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House Resolution 54

Resolved, That after September 23, 1929, the House shall meet only on Mondays and Thursdays of each week until October 14, 1929: Provided, That if in the discretion of the Speaker legislative expediency shall warrant it, he may designate a date prior to October 14, 1929, on which the business of the House shall be resumed, in which case he shall cause the Clerk of the House to issue notice to Members of the House not later than one week prior to the date set by him.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the Speaker, so that the RECORD may show it, whether he anticipates the calling of the Members back after the recess to September 23 and prior to October 14 for any purpose other than tariff consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would construe the language of the resolution to instruct the Speaker not to call the House back except for the consideration of the tariff bill or some national calamity which could not be anticipated.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Connecticut what it is contemplated shall be transacted at these sessions on Mondays and Thursdays?

Mr. TILSON. It is agreed that there shall be nothing transacted except to convene and adjourn; no business whatever.

Mr. GREEN. Will the roll be called?

Mr. TILSON. It is not expected that there will be a quorum present at any time.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut one question. Suppose demand were made for the appropriation of additional money for the Farm Board to handle the cotton which will be coming on the market for this time; would this be considered as something to permit calling the Congress together?

Mr. TILSON. The Speaker might be constrained to rule that that was a national emergency.

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope he would.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I send an additional resolution to the Clerk's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 55

Resolved, That the Speaker may at any time during the months of September and October designate any Member to perform the duties of the Chair, notwithstanding the provisions of clause 7 of Rule I.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

PENALTY FOR CERTAIN ALIENS TO ENTER UNITED STATES

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request for the present consideration of the bill S. 1537.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1537

To amend subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law," approved March 4, 1929

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law," approved March 4, 1929 (Public Law No. 1018, 70th Cong.), is amended to read as follows:

"That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of 60 days after the enactment of this act he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That this act shall not apply to any alien arrested and deported before March 4, 1929, in pursuance of law, in whose case prior to his reembarkation at a place outside the United States, or his application in foreign contiguous territory for admission to the United States, the Secretary of Labor has granted such alien permission to reapply for admission."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the proposed amendment to the recently enacted deportation law which will become effective March 2 of this year is to cure a retroactive feature of that law which has caught a few "technically" deported aliens who, before March 4, had a right to return after the intervention of one year. The bill comes from the other body, and if you will look at the RECORD of yesterday, page 3058, you will find the first section of the law, and will note that the amendment is that part stated as a proviso.

The new deportation statute made it a penal offense for aliens deported through its terms, provided they are again found in the United States. But under the old law some could return within one year if they received permission from the Secretary of Labor. The new law stopped a few who had received this permission; hence this amendment is offered.

I call attention to the fact that this amendment, if adopted, would not permit aliens to have been deported for crimes committed here or crimes committed before they came to the United States; they would not be subject to the amendment because the law stands against the admission of such aliens. Neither would it apply to the insane. It would only apply to those cases known in both the State and Labor Departments as technical cases.

All of these develop from the basic immigration act of 1917. In that act a provision that a person permitted to go out and not subject to nonreturn on account of crime may apply to the Secretary for permission to reenter within one year.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman proposes to offer an amendment to this Senate bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have gone over this as carefully as I could, and I have consulted the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX], and he thought that a clarifying amendment should be offered. To this I agree.

Mr. GARNER. That is what I asked the gentleman. Is the gentleman assured that if he gets permission to consider the bill his amendments will be adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This gives authority to the administration to permit the return of certain exceptional cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; deported prior to March 4 this year under the existing law.

Mr. GARNER. That is bad legislation. That gives it authority to say that A shall come in and B shall not. That is bad legislation. You ought to have a law that determines who shall and who shall not come in. I do like a provision that gives the executive branch of the Government discretion to say who shall and who shall not come in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We are in that situation because we have the Burnett Act of 1917, which did have that provision for discretion as to certain people who did apply. Having had that permission, the Secretary of Labor finds himself in the position of having given that permission to certain people before this new law became effective. Read the new law, and gentlemen will find that no one gets it after March 4, and the amendment about to be offered will make it clear that the practice permitted under the act of 1917 is not to be carried on in the future. The department says it has made no such agreements since the new enactment of March 4 last. It would like to take up its old promises. That, I think, is proper, fair, and just.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I may make a statement of my understanding of this situation, under the act of 1917 and under the law as it existed prior to the act of March 2, approved March 4, 1929, the Secretary of Labor had authority in certain cases within his discretion to grant permission for the reentry of aliens who had theretofore been deported. By that act of March 4, 1929, Congress made it a felony for one who had been excluded to seek to reenter the country, and imposed other incidental penalties. I think it is not retroactive in any vicious sense, but up to the passage of the act of March 4, 1929, the Secretary of Labor was authorized and for many years had been authorized to grant these permits in these specified cases. Prior to the passage of that act the Secretary had issued some of these permits, exercising the right given him by Congress, and these people who are seeking to come in—I understand the number is very small, probably 35 to 50—are in possession of permits granted by the Government of the United States, acting by an official specially authorized thereunto. They have these permits to do that which in the later act is made a felony. The purpose of the bill, as I understand it, and I am going to offer an amendment that will insure that it will go no further than that, is to validate the permits given under the circumstances which made them valid at the time. The proposed amendment which I intend to offer, and on which the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and I have agreed, reads as follows:

After the words "United States" in the proviso, and before the words "Secretary of Labor" insert the words "and prior to March 4, 1929."

So that the acts done by the Secretary of Labor at the time when they were authorized will be recognized, and he will have no further authority to waive the provisions of the law; in other words, he had given these permits prior to the time we passed this act, when he had the authority to do so and when others had the right to rely on his action. Congress now ought not to repudiate the act done in a regular and a lawful way. Will that amendment be acceptable to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I will say to the membership that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] has stated the proposition clearly and exactly.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, does the amendment provide for the registration of aliens in this country?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No.

Mr. RANKIN. Then when may we expect a report from the gentleman's committee on the bill before it providing for the registration of aliens in this country, in order that we may know who are here lawfully and who are here unlawfully?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When the committee is organized, that is one of the major problems to come before it, and it is a very big problem.

Mr. RANKIN. Will that be taken up at the regular session in December and action taken on it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman himself will be invited to be the first witness.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand it, this bill has been before the Committee on Immigration for a long time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There have been half a dozen bills in each Congress for several years, each bill with a different plan.

Mr. RANKIN. But they have been before the committee for a long time, and the membership of this House is very anxious, I dare say, at least two-thirds of it, to get action on such a measure, and we would like to have some assurance that the committee will take one of those bills up and give us action upon it at the next session of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course, the membership of the committee is ever changing. As far as the chairman can assure anyone of the intention of the committee, hearings will be held and an earnest effort made to outline some workable plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Box: Page 2, line 15, after the words "United States" and before the words "Secretary of Labor," insert "and prior to March 4, 1929."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DR. K. WEFRING

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, we have in the gallery to-day a very distinguished visitor, Dr. K. Wefring, knight commander of the Order of St. Olaf, director general of the Norwegian Medical Service, and former Minister of Defense. Doctor Wefring also was a former member of the Norwegian Parliament and was a delegate to the Interparliamentary Union held in Washington, D. C., in 1925. [Applause.]

MINORITY CONFERENCE LEGISLATIVE CLERK

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 56

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, from and after July 1, 1929, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $320 per annum in addition to the compensation now being paid for services of the legislative clerk authorized in resolution of February 25, 1929.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I want to take just a moment to explain the object of that resolution. When the employees' compensation bill was pending before the House this discrepancy between the two clerks, one on the minority side and one on the majority side, was discovered. I took the matter up with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], and he said he preferred not to include any amendments in his motion to suspend the rules but said he would make an effort over in the Senate to have the amendment made. In the Senate they concluded not to add any amendments, so this was not put on. The salary mentioned in this resolution corresponds with the salary that the majority clerk will receive who does the same kind of work. The incumbent is Mr. Scott, who has been here for many years and who served as the minority clerk for Mr. Garrett of Tennessee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, it is usually the policy followed by the House to refer these matters to the Committee on Accounts. When this general increase bill came up here the other day I am confident I could have raised a point of order and have had it sustained, that the bill was improperly before the House. Would it not be better, I will ask the minority leader, if he took this matter up a little later with the Committee on Accounts? I assure him that so far as I am concerned I will try to see that justice is done in this case in particular. But I do not like the idea of bringing in resolutions, particularly now that this committee has pretty generally revised the salaries, to make changes in the salaries of the employees.

Mr. GARNER. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, I do not want to put him in the attitude of being compelled to object to the consideration of this resolution, although I do think that in accordance with every sense of justice and equity and right this proposed increase should begin on July 1 as in the case of the other salaries in the bill; but I will withdraw my request.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If it is clearly understood that this does not establish a precedent for the Committee on Accounts and for the House in the future, I shall not object.

Mr. GARNER. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if, before the adoption of the bill increasing the salaries of the legislative employees, the majority clerk and the minority clerk holding similar positions received the same salary?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; they received the same salary.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Texas will not interpose an objection when he finds other discrepancies similar to this?

Mr. GARNER. No. If the gentleman finds one similar to this I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

INDEBTEDNESS OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the formality of calling the Calendar Wednesday list be dispensed with, and that we proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the postponement of the French debt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution 80.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon calls up House Joint Resolution 80, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 80

Joint resolution authorizing the postponement of the date of maturity of the principal of the indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for its consideration. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] will kindly take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 80, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 80, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, under the Calendar Wednesday rule I understand there is now one hour allotted to each side?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand the gentleman from Oregon will have half the time on that side and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] will have half the time on this side. Is that the case? I ask that before we proceed further.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the understanding.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, at the conclusion of the World War the United States found itself in possession of a very large amount of war material in France, and proceeded to dispose of it to such buyers as might appear, and the chief buyer was the French Government. In 1919 a contract of sale with the French Government was agreed upon, disposing of $400,000,000 worth of this property on terms of payment covering principal due on August 1, 1929, with interest. The French Government issued bonds under the contract, and on August 1 of this year those bonds mature, and the President of the United States will find himself obliged to present the bonds to the French Government for payment on that date unless the pending resolution is agreed to. The total amount, with interest, minus the amounts that have already been paid, will be $407,000,000.

During the period from 1919 until 1926, when the Mellon-Berenger agreement was entered into, the French Government paid $51,160,785.50.

On April 29, 1926, the Mellon-Berenger agreement was made. This merged the amount to be paid for the war material with the amount to be paid for the loans made to France under the Liberty loan acts, so that we might have one account and one settlement with France.

Upon the signing of this agreement France paid the odd amount of $386,686.90, leaving the total due the United States from France as of that date $4,025,000,000. This $4,025,000,000, I wish to make it clear, includes both the amounts due for the war material and for the loans made under the Liberty loan acts; but the agreement regarding the war material was not abrogated.

So at this time we have an agreement with France for the payment of something over $400,000,000 due August 1, of this year. We also have a pending settlement, not agreed to, which includes this $400,000,000 with the amount loaned to France under the Liberty loan acts. If at this time the President demands the payment of these bonds we disturb the pending arrangement with France under the Mellon-Berenger agreement for settlement of both accounts; that is, since the war material amount is included with the loans, making the total amount due of $4,025,000,000, if we take out of that proposed agreement with France this $400,000,000, we have destroyed the Mellon-Berenger agreement and of necessity will have to undertake new negotiations for the settlement of our accounts with France.

The French Government has made payments during each year as follows:

In 1926	$20,368,057.25
In 1927	30,368,940.06
In 1928	31,644,482.17
In 1929 to this date	20,367,057.26

Since the agreement was not consummated until April 29, 1926, only a part of that year is involved. But during the years 1927, 1928, and first half of 1929, it has paid $82,380,479.49.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. You say they have made payments?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. According to the statement issued by the Secretary of the indebtedness of France in 1929, there is no credit given to the original funded indebtedness, and if they made any payments, no credits were given.

Mr. HAWLEY. My information is based upon information obtained directly from the Treasury.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. For the benefit of those who are inclined to look upon this country as a Shylock in these debt settlements, I should like it to appear as a matter of record here that the people of the United States are paying this year, in the way of interest on the money which they borrowed to lend to France, the sum of $171,000,000, and they are receiving not a cent.

Mr. HAWLEY. The statement I made a moment ago was obtained from the Treasury Department.

The French Government has always favored the Mellon-Berenger agreement, but the French House of Deputies and the people have not supported them in it; but whatever government has been in power in France has endeavored to have the agreement ratified, and that they regard it as a national policy to be consummated is evidenced by the fact that they are paying under it as if it were ratified.

The French Government, since the Mellon-Berenger agreement, has considered that it had made a complete settlement with the United States for both items and has been proceeding on that theory.

All that is to be done by the proposed resolution is to postpone the demand by the United States for this $400,000,000 for a period of not exceeding nine months—that is, not later than May 1, 1930—provided the French Government will agree to pay the interest that arises during that period.

According to cable dispatches the French Chamber of Deputies has designated June 25 as the time to consider the ratification of the Mellon-Berenger agreement. If my memory is correct, this is the most definite step yet taken by the French Government to settle this matter. They have fixed a date to take it up.

If we agree to this resolution and make this postponement, it will evidence a friendly attitude on our part to give the French Government a full opportunity to discuss the matter with its people and to come to an agreement by which our entire account with France may be settled.

I desire to emphasize a statement I made a moment ago, because it is quite important, in my judgment. If we demand the payment of this $400,000,000 with accumulated interest now, we have nullified or made impracticable the agreement we have had with France for the settlement of the entire indebtedness owing to us, because we have taken out of that agreement $400,000,000 as an advance payment, as it were, which entirely disturbs the terms on which the French and the American Debt Commission proceeded to make their settlement.

It took some seven years to conclude the Mellon-Berenger agreement, the agreement between the two nations. I do not know how much longer it would take to arrange a treaty for the settlement by France for the money borrowed from us.

The bill provides—and it is very short—in terms that the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to enter into an agreement with the French Republic providing for the postponement of the date of the maturity of the principal of its indebtedness in respect of its purchase of surplus war supplies, until the Mellon-Berenger agreement has been approved or disapproved by Congress, but in no event shall such date be postponed beyond May 1, 1930.

It seems to the committee—although I do not speak for the entire committee—that the proposed postponement is in the best interest of our own country. It is true we would get a little more than $400,000,000 on August 1. The Treasury has made no definite statement, but it has not been advised by the French Government that any failure is apprehended. The Treasury has not been advised that the French Government would not be able to meet this obligation on August 1, so it is presumed—they being an honorable body of men—that if they were not able to pay they would so advise this Government.

But if we make that arrangement we will practically say to the French Government that we adhere to the Mellon-Berenger agreement which this House once ratified. We appreciate that it will convey to the French Government an expression of our good will and that we have every confidence in its good faith.

The French Government collects 22 per cent of the national income of the French people for taxes. Their indebtedness is exceedingly heavy. They entered the war with an indebtedness of $6,290,000,000 and that has been greatly increased. They have always been our friends from the beginning. We have never had any cause for complaint of their conduct. Our previous financial transactions with them have been satisfactory, and now, when there comes a time when we have open to us the proposition to demand on August 1, 1929, the payment of $400,000,000 or to say we will adhere to an agreement formally made between the two Governments and ratified by one body of Congress, that the best interests of this country and of France will be conserved and peace and comity between the two nations will be promoted by our saying that we will give you nine months' grace in which to work out a very serious program, and I earnestly entreat the House on behalf of that great spirit that has always animated us that we give them this opportunity of solving what is to them an exceedingly difficult problem.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In the hearings, on pages 11 and 12, on this French settlement in the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, there is an indication that some of these war supplies covered by the $400,000,000 that we are asked to postpone were resold by France to European countries. Can the gentleman inform me whether the committee has the total amount so resold to foreign countries?

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know. As far as that is concerned, if I sell property to another, he owns it and has the right to dispose of it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And he pays for it if he is honest.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. And they have made such an agreement to pay and are paying.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think the gentleman ought to make it very plain and clear that unless the French Government ratifies the settlement on or before the 1st of August this resolution goes for nothing. The condition is that the Mellon-Berenger agreement shall be ratified on or before August 1 by the French Government. If the French Government does not ratify it on or before the 1st of August, then this resolution goes for nothing.

We do not outright give the French Government nine months or any such length of time, because the resolution is expressly conditioned upon the ratification by the French Government on or before the 1st of August. That is according to the terms of the resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. Did the gentleman understand me to make a different statement?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No; but I wanted to make that clear.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman is correct in his statement.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I want to make one other statement for the benefit of some gentlemen who were not here when the settlement was passed upon by the previous Congress in this House. The vote at that time was more than two to one in favor of the ratification; in fact, as I recollect it, 236 ayes to 113 noes. There was at that time no indication at all that there was any disapproval of the settlement of the Senate. The settlement has been approved by the House heretofore, and the French debt is the only unsettled matter, so far as debts to this country are concerned, that has yet to be finally disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY. With the exception of some very small countries.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes; and if we should now take such action as would necessitate, as the gentleman says, a further negotiation we would leave the French debt in the air, with all of the other debts owing by the great nations completely disposed of.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. There is a point here that is not clear to me. I understand that these bonds mature on the 1st of August, and that unless we pass this legislation we will be under the necessity of making a demand for payment.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Treasury says that they can find no authority for the President to postpone the demand.

Mr. HOCH. The question that I have in mind is this: Even though we pass this bill in the House and it does not pass the Senate, or even though the French Government should ratify the agreement, if the Senate should not ratify it how will that release us from the necessity under the law of making the demand for payment?

Mr. HAWLEY. The bill provides that if the Mellon-Berenger agreement should be ratified by France in accordance with the terms thereof prior to August 1, 1929, then the President can postpone demand.

Mr. HOCH. The point I make is this: The mere passage of the bill in the House would not do that. How will that change the status if we do pass the bill this afternoon, as far as the necessity for making demand for payment is concerned?

Mr. HAWLEY. I have been informally advised that as soon as we send the bill over to the Senate it will be taken care of there.

Mr. TILSON. Senators are working on that now. They are trying to work out an arrangement in the Senate by which this bill will be passed as soon as it comes over to the Senate from this body, and it is hoped that we may send it there as promptly as possible.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Has the French Government taken any steps so far to ratify this agreement?

Mr. HAWLEY. They have set the date for beginning the work of ratification on the 25th of this month. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], a member of the committee, in opposition to the bill, for one hour.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I do not think there is anything inconsistent in those who supported the proposed Berenger-Mellon settlement when it passed the House being now in favor of this resolution. It is merely a question of whether or not we wish to take a large cash settlement now or take our chances of securing a larger settlement during a period of 62 years. That is the problem that confronts those who voted for the settlement, the 236 referred to by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. I happen to have been one of the 113 who did not support the settlement, and in view of the fact that in this House and in the press those Members who voted against those various settlements have been variously designated as Shylocks I think I should say a word or two in defense of them and in defense of myself. After I voted against the English debt settlement I read an editorial in one of the great newspapers of nearly a column in length which was headed "A Modern Shylock," and to my astonishment I found that I was the gentleman to whom the editorial referred. I think it might be well for me to briefly relate some of the reasons which actuated those in voting against these debt settlements. We are now practically dealing with the last settlement, and I know every Member of this House and the country as well are anxious to have all of the foreign debt settlements behind us.

When it was determined by the administration to lend many billions of dollars to our allies it was necessary to first borrow this money from the American people before we could loan it to the friendly nations who needed it.

Congress was told that the American people would not lose anything by reason of these loans, because we would take from our allies bonds identical in character with the bonds we had to give in order to secure the money to make the loan. This assurance had been given by foreign governments, and practically all of the Members of Congress, including myself, relied upon this assurance. I went to the people of my State and in other States, trying to induce them to buy these Liberty bonds. I told them that for every dollar we borrowed from them to lend to our allies we would pay them 4¼ per cent interest, and that we would take from that country that borrowed this dollar from us a similar bond drawing interest at the 4¼ per cent.

The American people cheerfully brought these Liberty bonds and loaned this money to the United States, and the United States then loaned this money to our allies.

The Secretary of the Treasury at that time, Mr. McAdoo, did not immediately, as these moneys were loaned, require the foreign governments to make bonds. For this he should not be criticized, for these moneys were loaned in installments. For instance, England would notify the Government of the United States that during the course of three months that country would need a billion and a half dollars, but that the British Government would draw these moneys only as they were needed. I am mentioning this only as an illustration, and am not referring to any particular transaction. The British Government, in order to save interest, and perhaps for other reasons, would draw, say, five millions within two weeks, and at the end of that period another amount would be borrowed. Therefore, Mr. McAdoo would, as the loans were made, take from the foreign governments an acknowledgement in the way of an I O U or a due bill.

There was a distinct understanding that later on the debts would be put in proper shape. But before this could be done a new administration assumed control and the new administration appointed a Debt Funding Commission, to act in conjunction with similar commissions from foreign countries, to refund these debts.

England was the first to come and make a settlement. We made a good settlement with England, perhaps the best settlement that could have been made. I want to pay a tribute to England for coming over, almost immediately after the war was over, and insisting upon a settlement. We lost only about 15 per cent on the English settlement.

I did not vote for the English settlement for several reasons. These settlements were made upon what was supposed to be the capacity of the foreign government to pay. Of course, I knew that if a government has not got the money to pay, that we could not make them pay; but in view of the assurances I had given to the American people in speeches here and elsewhere I wanted to be sure that the Debt Funding Commission had determined, without question, England's capacity to pay.

This settlement was considered by the Ways and Means Committee; and while I did not know what England's capacity to pay was, there was not sufficient evidence before us to justify a settlement that would cost the American people hundreds of millions of dollars, and perhaps several billions of dollars, before all the settlements were made.

I asked the chairman of the committee to call the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, before us and let him tell us by what methods and by what investigation he had determined that Great Britain's capacity to pay had been fixed at 85 cents upon the dollar. I told the committee that this determination might be correct, and I did not want the pound of flesh, but that I wanted such information as the Secretary might have in order that I could explain to the people of my State and district, and elsewhere if asked, why we scaled a debt made by the second greatest country in the world 15 cents on the dollar.

I was told by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. BURTON, then a Member of this House and also a member of the Debt Funding Commission, that some of the information that the commission had received was of so confidential a nature that it would not be wise for it to be disclosed. Being of the opinion that a creditor has the right to know why his debtor insists upon a compromise, I insisted, and the chairman of the committee stated that I was obstructing the proceedings and demanded the clerk to call the roll. Under such condition I voted in the negative both in the committee and in the House.

Some of these settlements were scaled 80 per cent. This proposed settlement with France is scaled 50 per cent. I have voted against nearly all of these settlements. I did vote for the Belgian settlement and perhaps one or two other small settlements. But the evidence submitted to me was not satisfactory as to the determination of most of the foreign countries' ability to pay.

I knew that these debts had to be refunded. Many have tried to throw a great mystery about the complicated details of refunding a debt. There is no mystery nor complex difficulties about such transactions. I had no misgivings as to the difficulty of refunding if the party owing the money is anxious to negotiate.

Gov. Bob Taylor, of Tennessee, once said in reference to the refunding of some bonds in his own State: "What does refunding a debt mean? All it means is swapping one note for another." And I had been doing that for a long time, so I thought I could qualify. [Laughter.]

They have brought a sentimental note into this business deal that we are now called on to make. We are not here to-day to refund a debt. We are not here to-day to extend the time of payment on one dollar that we loaned to France to help win the war. To-day we are discussing a totally different proposition. We are discussing a proposition to postpone the payment of a debt incurred after the war was over.

I would not object to the postponement of the date of payment for 9 or 10 months if that was all that was involved in this postponement; but this postponement may cost the American people over $400,000,000, and I do not believe that sentimental reasons should be brought into the discussion of such a settlement.

Reference here to-day has often been made to how the gallant French people helped America in our hour of need; how the noble Lafayette, the friend of Washington, devoted his life, his fortune, his all for the relief of a brave people fighting for freedom. I yield to no one in America in my admiration for the French people.

I respect and revere the name of Lafayette as much as any Member of this House. No sordid ambition for place or power, no affront to his personal feelings, could ever cause Lafayette's footsteps to stray from that path of human freedom which in his youthful heart he had sworn to tread.

To him human liberty and human freedom were sacred and inalienable rights which should be preserved everywhere. In his manly bosom burned the zeal of the crusader. It mattered not to him that those struggling against tremendous odds for liberty and independence were not compatriots of his own beloved France. It mattered not to him that the scene of that great conflict for the preservation of human rights was in a far-distant country over 3,000 miles away. All that he knew, all that he cared to know, was that across the water a brave people, borne down by oppression, were struggling to be free. As was said of him once in the American Congress:

> To Lafayette the soil of freedom was his country. His post of honor was the post of danger. His fireside was the field of battle.

It is with feelings of the deepest gratitude that we recall the services of France and Lafayette to the struggling colonists in the hour of their greatest need, and it is with a feeling of pride that we also recall that the descendants of those same colonists a century and a half afterwards carried the American flag across over 3,000 miles of water and, rendering aid and assistance to France in the hour of her greatest need, broke the Hindenberg line and added imperishable glory to American valor and American arms.

Debts of gratitude can not be weighed and measured. We will forever remember the chivalrous aid of France in our hour of need, as doubtless France will forever remember the aid and assistance America gave her in her hour of need.

We are now discussing a business proposition. We are considering a business arrangement between nations. We are discussing whether or not a note which is due will be renewed or demand for payment will be made. A note for $407,000,000 which, after the war was over, France gave us in return for something over a billion and one-half dollars' worth of surplus war supplies.

This note was separate and distinct from the money we loaned France to help win the war. We let France have these supplies for about 20 per cent of their value, and France gave us her promise to pay, which bears date of August 1, 1929.

This note I understand France is ready to pay. As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means I have received no intimation from any member of the French Government that France wants this note extended. The Treasury officials tell us the note will be paid. I have had outside assurances, whatever they may be worth, that the money has already been collected and set aside to meet this note.

It is true that the debt settlement which passed the House provided that this $407,000,000 should be merged into the war debt and that it should be amortized along with the rest of the war debt for a period of 62 years. But neither the Senate of the United States nor the French Government has ratified the debt settlement that passed the House, though the French Government has had ample opportunity to do so, for it has been several years since the settlement passed the House.

Now, we are asked to extend the time of payment until May 1, 1930, in the hope that after waiting three years France will ratify the debt settlement made by the House.

I again repeat and emphasize that this transaction is not a part of the war debt. Every dollar that France owes us of this $407,000,000 was for the purchase of supplies that France bought after the war was over.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And France sold a great part of those supplies to other European countries, did she not?

Mr. COLLIER. That may be so, but that is not the point I wish to emphasize. As business men I ask you this: What advantage would it be to the United States to surrender $407,000,000 that the French Government is now ready to pay, in the hope that in 20 years from now we will get $484,000,000 and in 42 years thereafter get the remainder of the debt? We have already waited 10 years, and the aggregate payments of the war debt and the debt for supplies will in the next 10 years amount to only $484,000,000.

But, say the gentlemen on the other side of this question, after 1940 the debt payments of France to America will largely increase. My friends, I wish I believed this to be true, and I mean no reflection upon France any more than the other governments when I make this statement. In a period of 30 years a great many political and economic changes are bound to occur. The further we get away from the war the less interest will there be taken in these debts and a greater desire for compromise will be found. Who knows, though God forbid, that we might be drawn into another war, in which some of our allies might be our enemies and our foes in the late war might be our friends? What then would be the attitude of America and the other countries in reference to these debts? Who knows what the second generation after the war will do in this matter. Yet we are now asked to surrender $407,000,000, in the hope that we may get larger returns for our children's grandchildren.

You heard the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] tell you just a little while ago that we were paying $171,000,000 of interest this year upon the French debt settlement alone. My friends, without any reflection on France or any other country, but as one who is guarding the interests of his own country as best he can, knowing as I do that the further we get away from the war the greater the chance of cancellation of these debts, I ask you, Shall we take into the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of August $407,000,000 cash, or shall we wait 10 years, when the annual payments up to that date will aggregate only $77,000,000 more than the amount of $407,000,000 which I understand we can now secure?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Did not the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] say that if we demanded and received this money that would end the general settlement? In other words, if we insisted on the payment of this money and received it, that would be entirely inconsistent with the Berenger-Mellon settlement and would probably remove any responsibility of the French Government toward ratifying that general settlement?

Mr. COLLIER. The gentleman from Oregon may have stated that, perhaps he did. But I want to ask the gentleman this question: I have been on the committee and heard the testimony and others on the committee have heard the testimony, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] where he got his information as to that?

Mr. HAWLEY. I said we had an agreement with France, including this item, to be paid in installments. Now, if we come in and demand in another form the payment of many times this amount in the first settlement, we would set aside that agreement because it is not in the agreement that was made.

Mr. COLLIER. I am not speaking from the standpoint of those who believe they should support the resolution. I am actuated very largely by the desire to see $407,000,000 come now into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TILSON. Is the gentleman willing to give up all hope of anything coming in the future?

Mr. COLLIER. Well, you know, "hope springs eternal in the human breast," and I want to say to the leader over there, I am one of the most hopeful men in the world. I can not conceive how during an emergency, a great country—and France is one of the greatest countries in the world—contracted a debt with another country, and then after the emergency was over contracted another debt, and then 10 or 12 years afterwards said, "If you make me pay the debt I contracted after the war emergency had passed, I will not pay you the other debt." I have got to have more evidence than I have heard yet to believe that the great Republic of France would do this.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will agree we would have to make a new agreement.

Mr. HASTINGS. That ought not to take 15 minutes with an honest government that knows it owes another government a certain amount of money.

Mr. TILSON. It has taken longer than that to make this one.

Mr. COLLIER. I am willing to quadruple the time the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] states, and suppose it takes us an hour, let us go ahead and make the new agreement. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. May I say that my point with respect to the statement of the gentleman from Oregon is that inasmuch as the French Government is practically living up to the Mellon-Berenger settlement and is making the payments called for by the Mellon-Berenger settlement, would it not be penny wise and pound foolish for us to insist upon this $400,000,000 and upset the arrangement for an infinitely larger sum which is being paid and will be paid?

Mr. COLLIER. Well, I am sort of like my good friend from New York; and in order to get a little, I very often take chances on getting much more.

They talk about the French living up to this agreement. I will ask the chairman of the committee, When was it we sent this settlement to France?

Mr. HASTINGS. June 2, 1926, three years ago.

Mr. COLLIER. What have they been doing since that time?

Mr. HAWLEY. So far as the French Government is concerned, it has been making payments under the agreement, but the French Parliament has not ratified it.

Mr. COLLIER. Exactly; and right now there is some hope that the French Parliament will ratify it. If the French Parliament does not ratify it, all this discussion here to-day is mush and amounts to nothing. If they do ratify it and this resolution passes, it will then go in in the regular payments. If they do not ratify it, we may, according to the Treasury officials and others—and I do not question the honesty, and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy, of their assurances that they have given us—we are going to get this money.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is this statement of facts correct, that France now has the money with which to pay this obligation to the United States?

Mr. COLLIER. Such is my information.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that they propose to pay it if we do not postpone it?

Mr. COLLIER. Such is my information; and I will ask the chairman of the committee if that is not his information?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will say that that is the information we have had before the committee.

Mr. COLLIER. That information was given to us by that very able former Member of this House, Mr. Ogden Mills.

Mr. SIMMONS. And if it is postponed, it is then merged into the general French settlement and will be paid in installments over the 62-year period that that settlement provides.

Mr. COLLIER. It has already been merged into that settlement.

Mr. SIMMONS. If France has the money to pay, is able to pay, and ready to pay, what reason have they advanced for the United States refusing to take the money?

Mr. HASTINGS. None.

Mr. COLLIER. The whole proposition is this: I want to be fair, as the gentleman from Oregon has stated, the French Chamber of Deputies is now trying to get this agreement ratified. If they get the agreement ratified then, instead of having to pay $407,000,000 on the 1st of August, they will only have to pay $30,000,000. The advocates of this measure claim that the country of France is in such a situation—and this may be true, for all I know—that it will overbalance things in an economic way over there to force them at one time to pay as large a sum as $407,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding that they propose to pay this amount on their other indebtedness if it is not paid to the United States; is that correct?

Mr. COLLIER. I do not know what they are going to do about other creditors. I am just bothered about our little bill just now.

Mr. PALMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the gentleman if he thinks we will lose any of our rights by giving France an extension of nine months?

Mr. COLLIER. I would not say that we would lose any of our rights; we might lose $407,000,000 though.

Mr. PALMER. And does not the gentleman think that it would be the part of wisdom——

Mr. COLLIER. Is the gentleman talking about rights or money?

Mr. PALMER. Whether we would lose any of our rights.

Mr. COLLIER. Our rights we may not lose, but I have been talking about money.

Mr. PALMER. I am coming to the money part now. Does not the gentleman think it would be the part of wisdom to give them nine months' extension rather than to disarrange the entire agreement in view of all the facts?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three minutes more.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. DUNBAR. The question has been asked if it would be advisable, in view of certain contingencies that would affect the payment of the French debt to the United States, for us to demand the payment of the $400,000,000 now rather than permit it to be funded. I wish to call attention to the fact that if we permit the $400,000,000 to be funded in a general funding debt of France that on a basis of 4¼ per cent the $400,000,000 will now be worth less than $200,000,000. We could better afford to let France pay us $200,000,000 cash on the 1st of August than to refund the $400,000,000 in this general funding debt.

Mr. COLLIER. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Has France asked for the suspension or postponement of this payment; has it made any request on this Government?

Mr. COLLIER. I do not know; I understand there is a definite effort to get the matter postponed from the 1st of August.

Mr. SIMMONS. But have they requested a postponement of the payment of the $400,000,000?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TILSON. Undoubtedly it would please France if, in their effort to ratify the agreement—long overdue, I admit—we should give them this further time. If we do not pass the resolution, we might make it impossible for them to ratify it.

Mr. SIMMONS. They have had a long time to ratify the agreement.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but political conditions have been in a terrible state in France. I have great sympathy for France in her endeavor to ratify it, and I do not want to make it more difficult. I think it is an opportunity for this great Nation, and especially when we are not going to lose anything, but in the long run will gain, and gain in a way that we will preserve our self-respect and honor. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Now, in conclusion, whatever the result, it is not going to make or break us. I have pursued a certain policy in regard to these debt settlements because I was not convinced that the utmost capacity of these countries' ability to pay had been made to my satisfaction. When we loaned some of these foreign countries money for 10 years without interest, and then for the next 10 years at only one-eighth of 1 per cent interest, while we are paying 4¼ per cent interest on money that we borrowed to loan to them, I am tired of seeing Uncle Sam made the continual and universal Santa Claus. I have made up my mind that it is time we should look a little more to the interests of the American people.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who wanted to know if it would not be better to postpone the maturity of this note, in the hope of getting more during a period of 60 years, I say that I think it best for the interests of the American people to take the $407,000,000 that is now offered to us.

This is the course I believe every business man would pursue in a business transaction. If we would pursue this course in a business transaction involving our own personal business, then it is our duty as agents of the American people to look after the business interests of the United States as carefully as we would look after our own.

This is the first opportunity that the American Government has had since the beginning of the war to get back any material part of the money we have advanced to the French Government.

I for one am willing to embrace the opportunity, accept the $407,000,000 for supplies bought after the war was over, and then trust to the honor of the great country of France to do the best she can in regard to the balance that is owing to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to discuss this matter in detail. I regret very much to see, however, any retrocession from our former action upon a substantially similar resolution.

This last debt settlement or resolution was passed by a good majority in this House. We now simply approach a point in the negotiations for a consolidation of all that is due, not only the French debt generally but also the debt for the supplies and material that France took over from the United States after the war. It might be interesting to consider in that connection this phase: Suppose France had not taken over those supplies. To whom could we have sold them for as much as France offered and thus far has met all installments? What have we gotten out of any war material, Navy material, and supplies sold in this country? Our decayed and decaying ships are the obvious replies.

Again, gentlemen, is it exactly a fair criticism that France has delayed in settling or paying these debts? What nation, with the exception of Belgium, has suffered as France suffered by reason of the immeasurable catastrophe that we call war? It is asserted here in debate that there has been such a delay as indicates a disinclination on the part of France to pay. Is that a fair criticism? Have not the events in the past few weeks determined that France has reached the first moment whereby she could take any inventory to assemble and assess all of her assets and obligations, and from such an accounting determine what she could pay? Only under these recent investigations, led unofficially or semiofficially by eminent American citizens—in considering the assets and debts and reparations of the warring nations—has France realized her assets and how she could best pay her debts with those assets. You must realize that a nation can not pay if you take her principal. If you take from a nation her taxable values, then she can not pay. A nation can only pay from the income which she raises through the medium of taxes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In a moment. When you diminish or destroy the principal, when you impinge upon the property assets upon which the tax is laid, then you at once imperil or destroy her capacity to meet her obligations. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I might say that if France would not rattle the sword so much she could cut down a good many hundred million a year which she has been using since the World War for military establishments. She would then have more capacity to pay.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That may and may not be true.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. That is her business and not ours.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin is mistaken. One must be in her place to know what is wisest and best to be done. We exalt ourselves sufficiently to determine what we will do, but we do not accord France that right. She has been a great ally in the hour of our weakness and helped bring us into the family of nations, yet we are not willing to accord her the right to determine her capacity to pay, but we will hold her to the book, forsooth!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, as I have before indicated, it is only within the past few weeks that France has been in the position to say what she could do, and now, since the debts and reparations negotiations, she knows what she has of property and credits with which to pay or meet her several international obligations. Her hands are sufficiently untied to undertake her settlement with America. She is not guilty of laches; she has just reached the point to make an accurate survey and to make promises she could fulfill. This moment has arrived. Will we embarrass or frustrate her efforts? I submit we should be prudent and tactful and somewhat fraternal and merciful. Would we like to have France arraign us in her parliament as we have criticized her in this House this afternoon?

Mr. Dawes has gone to England. He speaks hopefully of the tranquillity of nations. Are we promoting such sublime aspirations? We speak of peace and the efforts of America to promote peace. We proclaim the beneficent abandonment of war as an instrument to settle international controversies, but we would here grind the face of the poor in honest efforts to pay. Does such a position make for peace or evoke the respect of nations?

I do not take seriously the calculations of debt scalings. This agreement binds France, if she accepts it, to pay every cent that she owes us. It is true that the agreement covers a long period of time, with a low rate of interest, but it is an obligation covering the entire principal and interest. I give little heed to the value of the debt based or determined by the medium of the stock or bond markets. We must take a more accurate, practical, and humane view. One great nation looks at another great nation in the hour of her peril. We must accept her assurances; we must believe that she will repay her debts to us in full. I think that is a just and proper settlement, and, I might say, a righteous and merciful agreement. [Applause.] We are asked to postpone or suspend the operation of the agreement for nine months. What harm can come if we so do? Shall we run the risk of disrupting a major agreement of $4,000,000,000 in order to get $400,000,000 on surplus supplies? Shall we take the pound of flesh now, or wait for the restored nation to pay all in due order and dignity?

I know nothing of information that gentlemen here express that France can pay these obligations at this time, and I hesitate to venture my own opinion, because an offense might thereby be given when none is intended. I voted for all of these debt settlements thus far. They are nonpartisan questions and have been passed on by nonpartisan tribunals. I voted for them because I thought it was the best thing that we could do under the circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman just stated that we are asking to postpone this for nine months. That, mark you, is only in the event that France ratifies the settlement by the 1st of August.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is very true; and the gentleman has properly accentuated that by suggesting the question in several remarks made from time to time, and that shows that the resolution is not as bad as it appears on its face, even from the viewpoint of those who dissent from its purpose and terms.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. From whom does this request come that we waive our claim to this $400,000,000?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I imagine it comes from the President of the United States or those responsible for our foreign policies. But we are not asked to waive the $400,000,000, but to consolidate and postpone in periodic payments.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It certainly does not come from France. All the information before the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I happen to be a member, is to the effect that France has the money ready and is waiting to pay; but there is somebody unwilling that that money shall come from Europe to this side of the water unless they have a hand in it. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am frank to say that I can not answer the gentleman as to where that information comes from. I must assume that the information comes from those who are properly in its possession; namely, those responsible for our foreign policy.

Those who know the French people—and I do not know them as well as others—know very well that they are a proud and sensitive people, and they are not going to suggest their inability to pay. They would not suggest at this time otherwise than what has transpired in the conversations and negotiations relating to a final settlement.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Does it not amount to this, Governor, that if this resolution is not passed extending this time, and if France is able and willing to pay, and does pay, the $407,000,000, it vitiates the agreement entered into that we have already ratified? And do you mean that we would have to have another agreement with reference to the money loaned to the French Government during the war?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the gentleman is correct in the statement just made, but I think we should not run any risk of vitiating this agreement, and we should not say to France, "We will take the $407,000,000 now, because we have no regard for your honesty in paying the $4,000,000,000 debt." I say this because I think this is a noble, generous, and just position under the grave circumstances that now prevail and which arise out of the excrutiating experience France has undergone, and the immense obligation she has assumed and was compelled to assume. I think at least we should give her time and opportunity to surmount her difficulties. We must disdain to assume that her promise of fulfillment is insincerely made. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Does the gentleman from Virginia desire more time?

Mr. MONTAGUE. No; I thank you.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, it is distressing to me to find myself in disagreement with the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], who has just spoken. I was unable to applaud here when I heard his statements concerning the valor and the generosity of the French people, and the assistance of France to our Government in times passed. As a boy I always involuntarily lifted my hat at the very mention of the name of France, believing what history had taught me, that my own Nation had been saved by the patriotic fervor of France in behalf of our republican form of government, only to discover later that the patriotic fervor of France on that occasion was due to her intense hatred of England.

I was over in France a couple of years ago with my distinguished colleague from Virginia. I do not know whether he noticed, as I did, that on every corner, every environment that we touched, there was military display. I do not know what he thought about it, but all the while this thought came to me, that every dollar of the expense of it was being paid by the American people.

My friends, during the war I went out in the campaign and pleaded with my people, asking them to buy Liberty bonds in order that we might loan the money to France, with a definite understanding that we should receive as security the bonds of France.

I have only five minutes in which to speak now, but perhaps I may help the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] and give him an intimation of the proper answer to his question, "Who is inspiring this mad determination to put over this resolution at the present time?" I do not know, but I believe I know. I have no right to make a definite charge unless I have the proof of it, and so I will not make the charge. But I will offer the suggestion that it is probably the same influence that put over that infamous Italian debt settlement here in this House. Those influences pressed from the outside ever and ever until they finally succeeded in consummating the shameful international job. I want to cite attention to the apparently well-established fact that those interests cleaned up $16,000,000 overnight after we had passed that infamous Italian debt settlement. Now the gentleman might have no trouble at all, I apprehend, if he will get his ear very closely to some of those influences that put over the settlement, if he wants to find the real pushing influence behind this demand for the quick passage of this resolution.

My friends, I do not want to stand in the attitude of denying a fair sense of justice even to a country like France, which has so shamefully mistreated us by breaking every one of its promises to pay. I do not want to stand in that attitude, but what am I to do? As I see it, here is the only opportunity of ever getting a considerable amount of money from the Republic of France, which is a republic only in name. My information was, after spending a hundred days over in that country, that France would be a monarchy in a day if the French monarchists could agree upon a line of succession.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. HOWARD. The dream of the French people is for the coming of another Napoleon, not necessarily of the Napoleonic name, but another great one who will arise and make France again the mistress of Europe, as she was under the great Napoleon.

If anybody doubts this let him go over there and witness the pilgrimages of the people of France constantly, and their worshipful attitude toward the shrine of the great Napoleon. There are many shrines in France, but all of them pale into nothingness alongside that master shrine of them all, the tomb of Napoleon the Great. Of course, there are good people over there, but the attitude of the French people generally is inimical to the American people. You do not need to have any doubt of it if you will go over there and spend a little while. You may go over into Switzerland and into Germany and you will find in your capacity as an American citizen a warm welcome everywhere from the people, and a desire to greet you kindly and to make you feel at home. You do not find this in France. But I do testify to you that as between the treatment accorded to an individual American and all the Americans in my party by the people of Switzerland and Germany, in comparison with the treatment accorded to us by the French people generally, I would regard the Swiss and the Germans as our friends, and the other fellow as almost our enemy. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ESLICK].

Mr. ESLICK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentelmen of the House, I am against this resolution, which seeks a delay in our Government demanding payment of the $400,000,000 debt due us from the sale of munitions following the close of the World War. A number of reasons are assigned why this resolution should be adopted giving the French Government more time.

We are told that the French Government has so far complied with its contract by paying the interest on this debt. Well, this was nothing more than the duty of the debtor nation.

It is next said the munitions debt is merged into and becomes a part of the French debt settlement, to be repaid us covering a period of 62 years. Yes; and if this settlement is ever effective, when we count the time and rate of interest, there is a cancellation of one-half the debt, when, as a matter of fact, the French Government, from the sales of our munitions, realized $270,000,000 in the first five years.

The suggestion is made that we should defer payment, or, rather, demand for payment, of this debt maturing August 1, 1929, because France will likely ratify the debt settlement made by the representatives of the two Governments. Is this a valid reason for delay? France has had more than three years—since June 2, 1926—to ratify this agreement, and so far as the Congress in general knows we are as far from settlement as at the time when this House ratified the compact. France has certainly taken her own good time about ratifying and may continue to do so.

I agree with what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] said yesterday. I had rather have the money in our Treasury than to have the evidence of the debt. But the majority leader [Mr. TILSON] suggested that haste in this small collection might jeopardize payment of the larger debt. I can not agree with him. If France intends to protect her credit, the payment of this smaller debt when due will not call for a repudiation of the larger debt in the future.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason, I am against this resolution. I am against the policy of our debt settlements—the compromise and cancellation of part of the debts. I voted against the major debt settlements coming before the House since I have been a Member. I never intend to vote for any settlement now or in the future that cancels or takes away from our Government a dollar due it. Every dollar we cancel or give to the foreign government places just that much more burden upon the American taxpayers.

The money loaned to our Allies or used in the purchase of the munitions sold France, and for which the debt involved under this resolution arose, was raised by the sale of our Government bonds. I remember the statements made to our people in selling the bonds—bonds of our great Government—Liberty bonds. The people were told that this money would go to our Allies, and when the war was over and Germany was conquered, the allied nations would repay us this money plus the same rate of interest. But they have not done this—and they never will. When the drives were on to sell bonds the cry was "buy bonds, and buy till it hurts." In my country my people were patriotic. Our young men went to the colors, and the folks at home bought bonds. They borrowed from the banks large sums of money to pay for these bonds. And when peace came, and the depression in 1921 came, the banks called for their money, and many a farmer mortgaged his home for the money to pay his notes for the identical money that went into these bonds; and the price of his produce went so low he could not keep the interest paid on his debt. And many of these mortgages were held by the Federal land banks, and joint-stock land banks, but when interest became delinquent no quarters were shown these patriotic people. No cutting down the debt; no extension of time of payment over a period of 62 years, but the mortgagor advertised and foreclosed his mortgage, and 90 per cent of this property sold at one-half and less than one-half its value. And this was the property—the homes—of patriotic American citizens. We have shown favors to the other nations of the world, but not to our own home people. For one, if we have favors to extend, I say let us begin at home. I am for the American Treasury and the American taxpayer before I am for the Frenchman and his treasury.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. ESLICK. I will; yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why did they not take these bonds and get the money on them rather than sell their homes under mortgages?

Mr. ESLICK. Because these bonds went down to 85 cents on the dollar, and they sold these bonds at a loss of $150 a thousand in 1921 and 1922.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Even so, they did not shrink in value as much as other property.

Mr. ESLICK. That may be true, but there was a loss of at least 15 per cent on all these bonds to the men who were forced to sell them just following the war, and in the agricultural sections of the country they were sold by the wholesale. So long as I am a Member of this House I never intend to vote for the cancellation or surrender of another dollar due us by a foreign government. I never intend to vote for a postponement of, or agreement in compromise, which takes away or lessens in part the debts due us by others. [Applause.] Let them pay as we have paid and as our citizens must pay in the future. I am against this resolution and the policy it invokes in delaying the payment of the debts due us by the governments of the Old World. [Applause.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. How would you collect this money?

Mr. ESLICK. It would be optional with the government, just as it is now. If it were not paid, we would be in the same state we are now. But certainly this great nation with its credit at stake will not and can not afford to repudiate its just debts to us and the other nations of the world.

The promise to pay this $400,000,000 August 1, 1929, is the only specific promise to pay us any given sum of money despite the fact France owes us more than $4,000,000,000, and the French debt settlement was ratified by us June 2, 1926. France has not ratified this settlement. When, if ever, she will ratify it we do not know. And now comes the demand to pass on and extend time of payment of a specific sum on a fixed date to an uncertain date, and at best a long-drawn-out time with a large loss arising from the delay. I do not believe this should be done, and I can not support it.

Some time, and it now looks like it will come in the near future, we will be asked to cancel all our foreign debts. The pressure will be great. I fear the issue when it comes. The power of the international bankers is great. If cancellation follows, their gain will be the American taxpayer's loss. The war bonds are the obligations of the Government, but in the last analysis they must be paid by the people, for the Nation is the great collection of the people. The "folks" must pay. I am for the folks—the home folks, the American taxpayer. And the adoption of this resolution does not aid the American Treasury, but withholds this large collection from it. Let us say to France, You promised to pay us $400,000,000 for our surplus war material on August 1, 1929, and on that date we expect you to meet your obligation by payment in full, and to help bring about this result I shall vote against the pending resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate fully the delay which has been experienced in obtaining ratification of the agreement providing for the funding of the indebtedness of France to this country. I think, however, that we are apt to lose sight of the political obstacles which have confronted those in France who have desired ratification of the agreement. Having had some experience in Government service recently, both in Germany and in France, I think that perhaps I have some appreciation of these obstacles and of the point of view of those who have been responsible for the policy pursued in France in this connection.

The political obstacles to which I refer have had their foundation not only in the tremendous loss of man power and destruction of property which were experienced by France during the four years of the World War—a loss of man power equivalent to about 4,000,000 killed in this country and a property destruction estimated at many billions of dollars—they have also necessarily been related to those other factors with which we are all familiar and which have characterized the postwar period of French public finance. I include in this connection an inflated currency, the inability to balance the national budget, a colossal internal debt amounting at one time in pre-war terms to the equivalent of something less than $60,000,000,000, and the uncertainty as to what amounts if any would be collected on reparation account from Germany.

All these factors have contributed to the political obstacles which I have mentioned—obstacles which in the minds of many in a position to judge have made it out of the question heretofore as a political matter for any French Government to ratify any agreement carrying with it the obligation to make substantial payments over a period of 62 years. The best that could be done in their opinion under the circumstances was to assure the adoption of the policy already referred to, the policy under which, if I am correctly informed, America has been paid in full every cent due as interest in respect to the obligations maturing August 1 representing the sale of surplus war material, and in addition thereto such sums as have been necessary in each year to bring the total payments made up to the amounts required under the terms of the debt-funding agreement.

As a result of this policy it would appear that America has not suffered so far by reason of the failure of the French Parliament to ratify the debt-funding agreement. What is more, I can not see how America is going to lose one cent if we adopt the resolution which is before us at this time. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] can advocate demand for immediate payment of the sum of $400,000,000 just as effectively when Congress reconvenes as they can to-day and they will have the advantage of taking their position at that time in the light of such action as the French Parliament may take in the meantime. This is merely a temporary measure and under its terms we are to collect interest upon the August 1 maturity if payment is deferred.

I think we should keep in mind the situation which confronted the French Government when M. Poincaré assumed the helm about three years ago, for I believe that the progress made under his leadership will be recorded as one of the outstanding accomplishments in the field of public finance in the world's history.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Can the gentleman tell me how much has been paid in interest by the French Government up to this time?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I can not give the gentleman the exact total, but I understand that every cent of interest payable on the obligations maturing August 1, representing the sale of surplus-war material, has been paid.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman does not know the amount?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I do not know the exact total. It would be $20,000,000 a year from the date of the obligations, whatever that date was—August, 1919, I think.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. DUNBAR. The amount that has been paid as interest on our $400,000,000 obligations is now to be made available under this resolution, if it passes, to be applied on future obligations to the extent of $102,000,000. No interest has been specifically credited as having been paid on the $400,000,000.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, I believe that decision would depend upon whether or not the debt-funding agreement is in fact ratified and goes into full force and effect. If it is ratified, obviously inasmuch as it covers the obligations representing the sale of surplus-war material as well as those evidencing advances under the Liberty bond acts, the payments would be applied under its terms generally to the new obligations issued by the French Government in funding its entire indebtedness.

Mr. DUNBAR. To that extent no interest has been paid on it to date, that is credited as interest paid.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am not sure just how it has been credited on the books of the Treasury, but I understand that the $20,000,000 or the equivalent of the $20,000,000 payable annually on the obligations maturing August 1 has been paid regularly and in full when due from the outset.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Is not this about a fair statement? The reason why the French debt settlement has not been ratified has been that doubts have been raised as to the capacity of the French to pay, and that they have been reluctant to enter into this binding agreement owing to the extreme uncertainty as to the future, but that notwithstanding their failure to ratify, they have scrupulously lived up to it, as far as they have been able, keeping up with the payments currently, and now that the new arrangement, the Young plan, has been made possible, the chances of ratification are very much enhanced, and if we pass this resolution it may well contribute to that result.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think that is a fair statement. If I may conclude what I have in mind to say, I desire to emphasize that under the administration of M. Poincaré, to which I have already referred, we have seen the French currency stabilized, we have seen the national budget balanced, we have seen the internal debt fixed at about one-fifth of its pre-war value, or, say something less than $12,000,000,000, and only recently, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has pointed out, we have seen a plan prepared in Paris with the unanimous indorsement of all of the experts there assembled, looking to a definite settlement of the reparation problem, which for over 10 years has defied solution.

Under these circumstances it would seem that we have approached a substantial compliance with the conditions which many in France have felt would be sufficient to overcome the political obstacles to approval of a debt funding agreement, and I think we have every reason to hope that those desiring ratification may now find themselves in a position to accomplish the desired end when the matter is taken up in the near future in the French Parliament.

To adopt the resolution before us as I see it is merely to say to those who are seeking ratification in France, that if they are successful in their endeavors on or before August 1, then they may rest assured that France will have the benefit of the agreement ratified in so far as the principal of the obligations maturing August 1 is concerned, until such time as it is possible for the Congress to reconvene and consider in its turn whether it will or will not ratify the principle agreement.

To exact the payment of $400,000,000 from the French Government on August 1 would be to require from France the payment of a sum far in excess of any payment required in any year under any debt-funding agreement with any one of our debtor nations. I do not believe that we should place ourselves in this position.

Mr. DUNBAR. England has paid in principal and interest three and a half times the amount of the $400,000,000.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I have not the British figures in mind at the moment, but I understand that France has paid what we have asked her to pay under the debt-funding agreement which was ratified by the House three years ago.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman regard that ratification by the House of a preceding Congress, when it was not ratified by the Senate, as of any binding effect upon this Congress?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. None whatsoever; but I think it was an expression of opinion on the part of the Representatives in office at that time.

Mr. HASTINGS. But we passed a good many bills through this House that were not passed by the Senate, and the Senate passed a good many that were not passed by the House three years ago, and did they not at all fall at the end of the session?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I merely want to emphasize that, if I am correctly informed, France has paid us everything that we have asked her to pay, under the agreement.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury on February 19 of this year shows that France owes us $4,525,000,000, exactly the amount of the funded indebtedness agreed upon in 1926. If she has made her payments, where do the credits appear?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. If the gentleman will look at page 52 of the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I think he will find in parallel columns the amounts required under the debt-funding agreement and the amounts paid in the three years since its execution—these figures indicate that the payments made aggregate more than those required under the agreement.

I hope sincerely that this resolution will be approved by the House. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we have listened with much interest to the very able argument by proponents of the pending resolution to extend additional time to France for payment of the $407,000,000 debt now due our Government. A few of the many advocates of this resolution have actually visited France, while many have never placed foot on French soil. During all this discussion we have heard much about "poor, poverty-stricken France," in this last desperate effort to induce Congress to extend the time for the payment of the debt that France justly owes us. I do not pose as one of those who particularly know France; nor do I claim to profoundly understand her people; but I do know something about that country and its economic conditions. I went, at the call of Uncle Sam, to that devastated country some 11 years ago. At that time it was poor, poverty-stricken, and in distress. But less than two years ago I went again to France, not as a soldier but as a delegate to a great peace conference. May I say that I did not find France to be the poverty-stricken country she is represented on this floor to-day as being? The wheels of progress are turning in France and that country has made rapid strides in a business way since the close of the World War. I was told that such a thing as a farm mortgage is not known in France to-day. Since we have heard so much here about "poor, poverty-stricken France," let me say that I found, less than two years ago, very little poverty in all France. The French people boast of being the best dressed in the world; as a rule I am sure they have sufficient to eat, and I might add, incidentally, they are not suffering from thirst. [Laughter.]

Oh, no, gentlemen; do not vote for this infamous resolution and then try to satisfy your conscience and also your constituents with the foolish plea that France is poverty-stricken, and therefore is unable to pay. I am going to make this prediction, that when we pass this resolution—as we will—and this debt becomes due again, France will once more be unready and unwilling to meet her obligation or pay any substantial part of it to our Government.

I do not claim to be intimately acquainted with all the great financial or political leaders in France, as some of you distinguished gentlemen who have plead so pathetically for the extension of these payments, but I have met many French citizens, all the way from bellboys to Government officials, and the first question they ask when you get to France is: "When is America going to cancel our war debts?" They do not ask: "How much will America cancel?" but "when" are we going to do it?

To be perfectly frank the fact is, France does not believe she owes us a dime. Nine out of every ten people in France do not hesitate to tell an American in her borders that France really owes us nothing. Having talked with many of the French, and having been in many sections of that beautiful country from the northern coast down to the Mediterranean, it is my firm belief that they do not intend to ever pay all the debt they owe us.

But I want to make my position plain and clear. We went to the assistance of France when she had her back to the wall and was fighting for her very existence. I have nothing but a kindly feeling for France, but she owes us money, and either France must meet her obligation or the American taxpayer must do so. As for my part, I shall insist that if this generation fails or refuses to pay us let their posterity pay.

I am sure you understand that I have no quarrel with France. I have soldiered with her sons and they are splendid soldiers. This is not a matter of sentiment but one of business, and I submit that it is poor business on our part to extend these payments of over $400,000,000, due August 1, which the French Government has already collected and will pay if it has to do so. It has been stated here that if we do not demand payment France will pay other countries this money. If this is not the case I trust some of you will correct me.

Of course, you are going to pass this resolution, because it has been whispered around that orders have been issued from the White House that it must be done. I yield to no one in respect to my President, but I can not, with good conscience, vote for the pending resolution which, to my mind, contemplates heaping additional burdens upon the backs of the American people. The time has come when I must vote for the tax-burdened people whom I am endeavoring to represent, or stand with you overgenerous, and entirely too sympathetic gentlemen who have suddenly decided that France is poverty stricken and absolutely unable to pay any part of her present obligations.

Now, it has not been so very long since some of you same big-hearted gentlemen were pleading the cause of Italy. You stood here on this floor only a few months ago where you stand to-day and plead, with tears in your eyes, for "poor, poverty-stricken Italy." So persistent and convincing were your pleas for that so-called destitute country that you induced this House to vote to cancel 74 per cent of the war debt Italy owes America. When you did that you took from the pockets of the American people and gave to Italy, under the pretense that she was unable to pay us more. You are about to do a similar thing to-day. You are about to force this resolution through Congress at the last moment of this special session, called to relieve the farmer, when you know that many who would not support this resolution have gone home and leaders are raking and scraping the corridors of the Capitol and office buildings in a desperate effort to find a quorum. This "relief" is evidently for the farmers of France rather than the American farmer, and in my opinion will be difficult to explain as coming properly under the President's call for the relief of American agriculture! [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for these three minutes for the purpose of asking a question of some one who can give us some information. As I see the situation, according to the statements made, France has the $400,000,000 ready to pay this indebtedness. They are willing to pay it. The Government of France has not asked that this indebtedness be postponed. The only reason we are given is that it is proposed to merge this indebtedness into the other debt settlement. My thought is we can rewrite that debt settlement for $400,000,000 and have considerable left over when we get through with the cost of it. [Applause.]

Now, what I would like to ask of the Republican floor leader [Mr. TILSON] or of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is this: Has the President asked that we take this action?

Mr. TILSON. I am quite confident that the President is very desirous that we should pass this resolution. It would be very unfortunate for this House to adjourn without passing such a resolution.

Mr. HAWLEY. And may I add also that the matter was urged while we were working on the tariff bill as an urgent matter and we took it up just as soon as we could after the tariff bill had been finished.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me go one further step and ask who it is and what the interests and reasons are that have prompted the administration to request the postponement of this indebtedness if the Government of France has not?

Mr. HAWLEY. I know of no interest except the public interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. What public interest is involved in refusing to take $400,000,000 that we can get for the benefit of the American Treasury?

Mr. HAWLEY. Because we have solemnly entered into a formal agreement through our official agency, the Debt Funding Commission, and a similar agency of France, consolidating these two amounts; and the House, acting upon that report from the President and from the Debt Funding Commission, agreed to the proposal, and we think we ought to follow a consistent line of policy.

Mr. TILSON. And France has been acting upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The representatives of the United States entered into that agreement in good faith, and the House of Representatives three years ago approved it upon the statement made that if the House would approve it that would let the Government and the Parliament of France know we were ready to go ahead; but France for three years has taken no action, and for three years it has been understood that France proposes to take no action looking toward a settlement.

Mr. HAWLEY. I must disagree with the gentleman on that, if he will permit.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will let the gentleman disagree at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes.

The governments that have been in power in France have endeavored to secure ratification and have been operating to that end. They have paid in the last two and a half years, under the Mellon-Berenger agreement, showing their good faith, over $82,000,000, which is fully the amount called for under the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is to their credit; and it is my understanding the Government of France is ready on August 1 to pay this $407,000,000.

Mr. HAWLEY. But we have made an agreement that they can pay it in a different way in connection with the other settlement.

Mr. SIMMONS. But they have not ratified that.

Mr. HAWLEY. And we thought, as a solemn matter, after consideration of the two plans, it was better to consolidate the two amounts, and our Debt Funding Commission reported that and the House agreed to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and France has taken no action from that day to this looking toward a ratification of that agreement. The charge can not be made that the United States has repudiated it. We have said we were ready to go ahead and confirm it.

Mr. HAWLEY. They have set a special date on which they are going to take it up.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I wonder if the gentleman would not concede that the President of the United States, with his superior means of information and knowledge, is probably more competent to judge of what is for the best interests of the United States in this matter than the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, I am ready to yield to the President of the United States the ability that everybody concedes he has and the responsibility and the information he has, but I am not ready to surrender to the President of the United States my responsibility to the people of this country. The President would neither ask nor expect it. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I think I have no prejudice against any country on earth. I am sure I have no prejudice against the citizens of any country. I have none whatever against France, but let us just see what this situation is. France owes us $4,025,000,000. We entered into an agreement for an adjustment evidencing this indebtedness. We did not ask France to pay. In April, 1926, we only asked France to acknowledge it in writing.

This is not all. France owed us $4,025,000,000 and we offered to cut it down 52.8 per cent and remit the balance to them. Is this a harsh settlement?

We said to them, we are not asking you to pay; we are asking you to sign a memorandum acknowledging in a legal way your indebtedness. Let us not lose sight of this.

Then we said to France, We will extend this over a period of 62 years. Why, it has been stated here by Members that France has done a generous thing since that time. She has paid all she agreed to pay under the arrangement. Do not ever lose sight of the fact that if France had paid at the full rate she would have paid five times as much as she has paid. Let no man dispute that. They have paid the $30,000,000 annually, but you take the interest at 4¼ per cent on the $4,025,000,000 and it amounts to $171,000,000.

Why, of course, France would be glad to pay the lesser amount of $30,000,000 rather than the $171,000,000, and that is exactly what they are asking you to do now.

It is unthinkable to me that we, as the trustees of the American people, of the taxpayers of this country, after having entered into a solemn covenant with the people of this country when we borrowed money from them that we only loaned our credit to France; we not only did this, Members of Congress, we put $22,000,000,000 into the war. We raised the finest Army that was ever called to the colors. We threw two and a half million of them across the sea and, when the long-range guns were dropping shells into Paris and the people were panic-stricken and the lights were going out and when the army of Germany was within a few miles of Paris, these brave boys of ours whom we recruited and threw across the seas, came there and saved Paris and the civilization of the world.

And yet, what do we say to France? We do not say pay it. No; we know that they can not pay it. You acknowledge that you owe use $4,025,000,000, and after we have coaxed and been embarrassed and humiliated, after weeks, months, and years have elapsed we finally got their representative to sign an agreement. And now they are making propaganda in France and in this country for the remission of the entire amount of this debt.

Let me say that some of these days our own people are going to understand it. They are going to arouse from their apathy. I venture the assertion that there is not one in ten thousand—there is not one in fifty thousand—who knows how much we have remitted. We have lost in debt settlements based on the rate of 4¼ per cent interest, according to the tables of the Treasury Department, $10,705,000,000.

The amount we have lost with France in the settlement that we have remitted, according to tables, is $4,627,000,000.

Now, let us examine the $400,000,000. That was for war supplies bought after the armistice. As I have been told, it was for a much larger value than the $400,000,000, but that is neither here nor there; that is the sum agreed upon. France sold war supplies to their own citizens. The last report that we have is in 1924, and up to that time France had sold $270,000,000 worth.

Mr. KORELL. Will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. HASTINGS. No. You have plenty of time of that side. They sold $270,000,000 worth. They have collected that, and yet they are paying us nothing upon it.

You know it is stressed all the time that we have entered into this agreement. That is true we entered into an agreement June 2, 1926, but the Senate did not ratify it and Congress adjourned, and that resolution did not become a law. Everybody here knows it was not the law, and is not binding on this Congress any more than any other bill that fails. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who voted against the original French debt settlement, and I shall vote against this resolution. I feet that I owe some responsibility to the American taxpayers. The loans to France were financed by the sale of Liberty bonds to the American people, our Government paying 4¼ per cent interest on these Liberty bonds. The total amount that France would pay, principal and interest, on a 4¼ per cent interest basis would be $11,474,900,000. Under the debt funding agreement approved by the House of Representatives about three years ago France would pay only a total of $6,847,674,104.17, principal and interest. Therefore under the agreement France is relieved of the payment of $4,627,225,895.83 at the expense of the American taxpayers.

This $400,000,000, the settlement of which we are to-day asked to postpone, covers the war supplies purchased by the French Government after the World War had ceased. They were sold to the French Government for 33⅓ per cent of their value, according to the testimony of Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, appearing on page 12 of the hearings on the French debt settlement. These hearings also indicate that much of this material was resold to other European countries by the French Government.

Many Members of Congress have asked who is pressing for the passage of this resolution which provides for the postponement of the settlement for these war supplies. I have not the definite facts, but I can see the handwriting on the wall, and if you get right down to hard pan you will find that the fellows who are pulling the strings and moving the scenery in behalf of this postponement are the same international bankers who urged us into the World War and who have advocated the cancellation of all our loans to the foreign governments.

Some of those advocating the postponement embodied in the resolution now under consideration wave the flag just as it was waved prior to the time America entered the World War, as well as at the time the House was considering the French debt-settlement agreement three years ago.

Prior to the declaration of war the voices of special privilege and the international bankers raised the cry of "Stand by the President"; the same cry was raised during the consideration of the debt-funding agreement and is also raised to-day in behalf of the postponement of the settlement for war supplies. Up to December 31, 1916, the allied governments had floated $2,325,900,000 of private loans in America. The French Government alone floated loans totaling $695,000,000. The voice of the international bankers and the voices of those who loaned this money to the Allies were raised for war. These same voices were raised in favor of the unjust French debt settlement three years ago and are now raised in favor of postponing the settlement of the French war-supply debt. Those who favored the French debt settlement and favor the pending postponement for the settlement of the French war-supply debt talk much about the capacity of France to pay, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, claims that it is impossible to determine the capacity of any government to pay, especially over a long period of years. The facts indicate that France has capacity to pay for these war supplies and pay 100 per cent on the loans which we made to her. I respectfully submit that the evidence in the hearings on the French debt settlement clearly shows that the devastated regions of France have almost entirely been restored. These hearings show that the devastated regions, in so far as business activity is concerned, are in far better shape than before the World War. The French Government should settle in full for the war supplies on the date the settlement is due and should begin to settle the rest of the debt which she owes us. Since the World War she has appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars each year to maintain huge military and naval establishments and carry on wars of oppression against small nations. If France had showed the proper international spirit she would have used many hundreds of millions expended subsequent to the World War in carrying on wars and preparations for war to pay her honest debt to the American Government.

Some of those advancing argument in favor of the pending resolution wax eloquent in pitying the bruised lily of France and picturing her sacrifices for democracy in the late World War. France's history indicates that she is not the bruised lily making sacrifices for democracy, as some of those favoring the pending resolution would lead us to believe. She has conducted many horrible, oppressive, unwarranted wars of conquest. At the outbreak of the World War, France was allied with the Russian Imperial Government, one of the most tyrannical, backward, medieval despotisms in the world.

I can not evade my responsibility to the American taxpayers and shall vote against the postponement as embodied in this resolution for the same reasons that I opposed and voted against the French debt funding agreement ratified by the House of Representatives about three years ago, because uncontradicted testimony shows that France is well able to pay her honest debt to America; that she is rich in valuable territory in Alsace-Lorraine and elsewhere acquired as a result of the World War, which should materially assist her to pay her war obligations; that she has seen fit to maintain and augment her large war machine which has been used to carry on oppressive, unjustifiable wars since the close of the World War; and that the extent of her present military and naval establishment has increased the expenditure of our taxpayers' money in order to keep pace with her war machine.

I sincerely hope the House of Representatives will defeat the pending resolution, and send word to France that the American people have become disgusted with the conduct of the French Government in evading payment of her just debt. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I regard this as a matter so important that I shall deem it a national misfortune if this House shall take a long recess without agreeing to this resolution. It would leave us in this position: An agreement with France was solemnly entered into by this country three years ago. That agreement up to this time has been scrupulously observed by France, although not ratified by that country. By our demand upon France at this time for a sum which is included in the Mellon-Berenger agreement, that agreement will be placed in such position as to make it impossible for France to agree to it, when this is the only time within three years she has been in a position to ratify it. France has had her political troubles, naturally growing out of the war. It has been impossible heretofore to ratify this agreement by a vote of the Parliament, but the Government of France has scrupulously lived up to it. Here is the agreement which I hold in my hand. Beginning in 1926 there was a payment of $30,000,000, and then, with some deviation, gradually increasing until 1987, when the total amount of $4,025,000,000 will have been paid by France.

Have we any reason to say that France, having thus far lived up to this agreement and made her payments under it for three years, will now, after ratifying the agreement, refuse to pay under it? Can any one say that we shall lose the $400,000,000 if we fail to grab it now when we think it is in sight?

If we should fail to pass this resolution it would be a matter of such importance that the President would be justified, in case the French Chamber of Deputies does ratify this agreement, in calling us back here in the middle of July to pass upon it rather than place our Government in the unenviable position of having made it impossible for the agreement which we have solemnly entered into to be ratified by France.

I can not urge too strongly the fact that we are not giving up the $400,000,000. This resolution does not propose to give it up, and it does not bind us to give it up even though the agreement is now ratified by France. We are not obliged to give it up when we reassemble here in December. If we postpone the demand for it at this time, we can then refuse to ratify the French agreement if we wish to do so and still collect the $400,000,000; but if we take action now which makes it impossible for the French to ratify this agreement, then we have kicked over the whole agreement, and will have to negotiate a new agreement.

Mr. ADKINS. Who knows that France has this $400,000,000 to-day?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know, but we are not raising that question. I imagine that it would strain the finances of France to pay it now, but we must assume that she would strain her finances to do it.

Our relations with France have been always of a very friendly character. Beginning back in the days when we were weak and in distress, first the valiant Lafayette came to our aid of his own accord. Later on there came an army under Rochambeau and a fleet under De Grasse. From that time on, up to the present time, including the late war, our relations have been most friendly. We ran into debt to France in the early days, when we sorely needed funds. We were then given 60 years in which to pay it, and we are now giving France 62 years. It took us 60 years to pay our indebtedness to France, or to be exact, from 1776 to 1835, just 59 years; and then King Louis remitted a considerable portion of the interest in making the original settlement, just as we did in the present settlement.

Remember that the $400,000,000 that we are talking about is merged into the larger agreement, and that France has been paying during three years a part of the $400,000,000 in making the installment payments which she has been making. What position would we place ourselves in, when France has paid a part of that sum already, if, because we think we see $400,000,000 in sight, we should grab it rather than go on with the agreement into which we entered? I think that it would be little short of a disgrace to do it, so I hope that this House will seriously consider before going on record as opposing a simple resolution contingently postponing the demand for the $400,000,000 until Congress can meet and consider it. We are not even waiving the payment. When Congress meets in December, or earlier, if France has meanwhile ratified the agreement, we can take the matter up and, refusing to ratify the agreement, can then make a demand for the $400,000,000. In my judgment we ought not to do so, but the claim for the $400,000,000 would be just as valid then as it is now.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the gentleman, it would be a disgrace to do that now. Would it be a disgrace to do that next fall?

Mr. TILSON. Next fall, after the French have ratified the agreement, we are still free to do anything we please, just as we are now.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is a disgrace to do it now, then the gentleman is suggesting that next fall it might not be a disgrace?

Mr. TILSON. We should be in a position to do it, but I should regard it then, as now, a most unbecoming and unfortunate act on our part. I should not be in favor of doing it, and think it would be bad business on our part to do it; that is, to fail to ratify the agreement next fall; but the adoption of this resolution does not preclude us from doing it. We are simply postponing the demand for the time being, and this postponement is based on the contingency that meanwhile France shall have ratified the agreement into which our Government has solemnly entered and which the French Government has been living up to, although the French Parliament has not yet ratified it.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I heard it stated on the floor here that the Berenger-Mellon agreement was a 50 per cent agreement with France. Is it a fact that under the Berenger-Mellon agreement, with payments extending over 62 years, the United States will receive the full amount of the loans made to France, including principal and interest at about 2½ per cent?

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman is about correct; but whether he is or not, the agreement has been made, and I do not think it is very material at this time just what the terms of it are. The fact is that we have entered into such an agreement, and France has acted under it by making the annual payments provided for, although she has not had opportunity as yet to ratify it, owing to the unsettled conditions in that country; but let me again repeat that the Government of France has religiously lived up to the agreement, so that I am not in favor of putting her in a position to make it impossible for her to ratify and fulfill that agreement. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas an indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies in the amount of $400,000,000 is due and payable on August 1, 1929; and

Whereas the payment of such indebtedness is provided for in the agreement (known as the Mellon-Berenger agreement) made on behalf of the United States by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and approved by the President, providing for the funding and payment of the entire indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States; and

Whereas such agreement specifically provides that it shall not become effective until ratified in France and until approved by the Congress; and

Whereas the ratification in France of such agreement, in accordance with the terms thereof, is now under consideration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That in the event that the agreement between the French Republic and the United States (known as the Mellon-Berenger agreement) made on behalf of the United States by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and approved by the President, providing for the funding and payment of the indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States is ratified in France in accordance with the terms thereof, prior to August 1, 1929, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is authorized to enter into an agreement with the French Republic providing for the postponement of the date of the maturity of the principal of its indebtedness in respect of its purchase of surplus war supplies, until the Mellon-Berenger agreement has been approved or disapproved by the Congress, but in no event shall such date be postponed beyond May 1, 1930. Such agreement shall not be entered into unless the French Republic agrees to pay the interest upon such indebtedness upon August 1, 1929, and February 1, 1930, but the amounts paid as interest shall be credited against the amounts first due under the Mellon-Berenger agreement, if such agreement is approved by the Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the resolution (H. J. Res. 80) authorizing the postponement of the maturity of the principal of the indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves to strike out the preamble. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolution was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the resolution pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 132, noes 63.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman object to the vote?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; I object to the vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and nine Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll. As many as favor the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 86, answered "present" 2, not voting 214, as follows:

There was no objection.

ESTATE OF C. C. SPILLER, DECEASED

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the resolution (H. J. Res. 58) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1929, entitled "An act for the relief of C. C. Spiller, deceased, and to provide for the relief of the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased," with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the resolution and the Senate amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the Senate amendment increase the amount covered by the bill from $5,000 to $20,000?

Mr. BYRNS. No; the gentleman will remember that at the previous Congress the Congress passed a bill appropriating $8,000. The attorneys thereupon claimed 50 per cent of it.

The House then passed a resolution limiting their fees to 5 per cent and the Senate has raised it to 20 per cent.

While, personally, I think this is too much, at the same time it is either 20 per cent or 50 per cent, because there is a suit pending in court and if this is not passed before the recess I fear my constituent will have to pay 50 per cent and my constituent has requested me to ask the House to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I believe I will have to object. Why should we give this attorney 20 per cent? He is just using time as a lever to force us into passing a bill carrying 20 per cent.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope my friend will not object. A suit has already been filed in the District of Columbia court and that suit was temporarily held up at the request of the Senate committee until some action could be taken on the House bill. If this Congress takes a recess and we do not get back into session until October my constituent will be confronted by this suit down here in which the attorneys claim 50 per cent, and this is just a case of compromising, so to speak, on 20 per cent. If the gentleman objects it may result in his having to pay these attorneys 50 per cent rather than 20 per cent as fixed by this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman understands that the courts of the District of Columbia take a four or five months' vacation every year and there is no possibility that this case will be decided before we return.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman is taking a chance and a very serious chance on 50 per cent being paid to these attorneys, because pro confessos will be taken unless my constituents come here and employ an attorney to defend the case; and it will cost possibly $1,000 to do this. They want this action taken, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I have received a lengthy communication from one of the attorneys in the case, but I have not had an opportunity to go over the mass of data which he forwarded me. Did the gentleman receive data from this attorney? I believe he is practicing in New York and has a partnership here.

Mr. BYRNS. I heard him address the Senate committee last week for nearly two hours presenting his case. I was present at the time and participated in the hearing before the Senate committee.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think the attorney who is going to get 20 per cent performed duties which would justify 20 per cent of the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman, to be perfectly fair, I think the attorneys are entitled to more than 5 per cent. It was a question with me as to whether they ought to have 20 per cent. My personal opinion is that 10 per cent would have been ample compensation. This attorney in New York gets nothing. These services were performed by his father, who is now deceased, and by another attorney who is also dead, before the Court of Claims prior to 1916. They took the affidavits and tried the case before that court, and I think on a quantum meruit the court would give them a reasonable fee. The passage of this bill means $1,600 out of $8,000, and I may say to the gentleman—and I say it in all sincerity—if this bill does not pass I fear they will get $4,000 instead of $1,600. I hope the gentleman will not object. The Congress will recess for several months in a few moments, and it is impossible to have a conference between the two Houses. Something must be done before the recess if we are to protect this fund.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman understand that the heirs of the deceased attorney who took part in the case and performed legal services will receive a portion of these attorneys' fees or will the entire 20 per cent go to the partner who is now living?

Mr. BYRNS. No, there were two attorneys both of whom are dead and have been for some years. They have administrators. This fee of $1,600 will be divided equally between those estates. As I say there may be some question of whether they are entitled to the full $1,600, but I am satisfied that on a quantum meruit the court would give them 10 or 15 per cent and possibly 20, but if we do not pass the bill and recess without doing so my constituents will be put to the necessity of either permitting the decree of the court impounding this $4,000 or they will have to employ an attorney to defend the suit.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I want to say that this case should strongly impress those who have been condemning some Members of the House for insisting on a limitation of attorneys' fees in these claim bills.

Mr. BYRNS. I agree with the gentleman and shall gladly follow his leadership in that connection.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the fact that these attorneys will probably receive much more if we fail to agree to this Senate amendment I will not object.

Mr. BYRNS. I thank the gentleman.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

MAKING A TARIFF—A DOMESTIC QUESTION

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I include a speech delivered by me before the United States Chamber of Commerce on May 1, 1929.

The speech is as follows:

The tariff act of 1922 has fully justified its existence. It has restored confidence, rehabilitated industry, fostered agriculture, provided millions of wage earners with employment, and brought prosperity to our people. For the great majority of the articles for which it provided protection it is still efficient and sufficient.

But the past six years have seen the most remarkable developments here and abroad ever made in any similar period of history. New articles are produced, or old articles in new forms; scientific research has astonished men with its proficiency in relation to production of commodities; new machinery is devised; and new competitors have entered upon new fields of competition. By reason of these and other causes, competitive conditions have changed. We have fields of production and industry in which the forces of foreign competition are making serious inroads. It is necessary that the arm that protects industries now properly provided for be raised in their behalf. Notable among these is agriculture.

For this reason we have undertaken a readjustment of the act of 1922 to bring the beneficial effects of the protective tariff abreast of modern times. We are repairing the defenses where the attacks are making inroads. All our people and all our industries are entitled to the same consideration. It is the purpose of protection to place all producers and products upon the basis of equal opportunity against imports from abroad. Our remarkable growth from a people of some $16,000,000,000 of wealth and 31,000,000 of people in the sixties to approximately $300,000,000,000 of wealth and 120,000,000 of people in 1929, and a corresponding increase in all the desirable conditions of human life, are the outgrowth of the competition at home rather than that from abroad.

The Constitution confides to the House of Representatives the sole right to originate measures for raising revenue. The House has designated the Committee on Ways and Means as its agent to prepare and submit to the House bills for this purpose.

During the recent campaign the Republican Party proposed, if retained in power, to readjust the tariff. The country responded by the election of a Republican President and an increased majority in the House.

To execute the trust so confided, at the assembling of Congress in December, 1928, the Committee on Ways and Means agreed to prepare a bill for the purpose of carrying into effect this understanding. The hearings began January 7, 1929, at which the full membership of the committee sat. Over 1,100 witnesses were heard and 11,000 pages of testimony taken. Some 300 persons filed briefs, but did not appear in person. At the hearings each witness was assigned a definite time for an uninterrupted statement, and at its conclusion was questioned by the committee. No restriction was placed upon the cross-examinations, except that they should be pertinent to the matter then before the committee and to the preparation of a tariff. These hearings extended some 45 days.

After the hearings were concluded, in accordance with time-honored precedent of both the great political parties, the 15 Republican members undertook the work of readjustment.

At the hearings it was repeatedly stated that only evidence presented at the hearings, or submitted in writing, or information from governmental departments and agencies would be considered by the subcommittees, and that the subcommittees would hold no hearings.

About a month prior to the beginning of the hearings, the chairman of the committee designated each Republican member as chairman of a subcommittee for the preparation of the readjustments in a specified schedule. There were 15 schedules providing duties. Five subcommittees were appointed, consisting of three members each, having three schedules to consider, and each one of the three being the chairman of a schedule. The assignments so made were approved by the Republican members. The purpose was to cause each schedule to receive the intensive study of three men, one of whom was to be held specially responsible. The plan proved of great value at the hearings by assisting the members responsible for the several schedules in questioning witnesses, but of even greater importance in giving the members three months' notice of the particular work each had to do.

After the conclusion of the hearings, the subcommittees began work upon their schedules, reading the testimony and studying the briefs. The testimony and briefs were also analyzed by the experts of the Tariff Commission, and summaries of the evidence were furnished the subcommittees. This also enabled these experts to become thoroughly familiar with the problems before the subcommittees, to assemble detailed data, and to verify figures.

Also the Tariff Commission furnished the committee with a very important summary of tariff information.

Statistical documents and publications in considerable variety and official in character were used by the members.

During the preparation of the readjustments, the subcommittees had the assistance of men particularly qualified upon any given matter, including those from the Tariff Commission, representatives from the Departments of Treasury, Justice, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from the Customs Court and Customs Service. The function of all these was to furnish information upon the administrative questions, court decisions, customs practices, the past history of goods, wares, and commodities entering foreign trade as exports and imports, where and how produced, quantities, qualities, import values, sales prices, costs, labor, distribution, and the possibilities of increased production at home and abroad. There were other factors. The Republican members determined and assume all responsibility for the duties proposed.

These same qualified men sat with the 15 Republicans as each subcommittee made its report. Each such report was subjected to a detailed inquiry by the 15, and the subcommittee making report was requested to submit the data upon which their conclusions as to rates of duty were based. The reports of the subcommittees were carefully examined by the 15 and later again taken up for further cross-examination.

Every person in the United States has a direct and beneficial interest in the protective tariff in that it creates and maintains conditions of growth, and increasing prosperity which is redistributed sooner or later among all the people in the form of better prices for what they have to sell, increased opportunities of production, enlarging markets, better wages, and more steady employment.

This historic policy of our country has proven its importance over a long period of years. Occasionally a misapprehension of its purpose and a misunderstanding of its beneficial effects has caused it to be abandoned in favor of policies based on free trade. In every such instance the result has been that our people, after bitter experience of unemployment, limited markets, falling prices, and commercial and industrial depression, have returned to the policy of protection and have benefited thereby.

What a protective policy intends to do is to equalize the cost of production at home and abroad, and that in its application this means to adjust the differences in competitive conditions at home and abroad. The protectionists hold that the American market belongs to the American people. It was created by their labor, industry, ingenuity, and ability. It is a thriving, prosperous, and active market. It absorbs goods, wares, and commodities in an amount in excess of $90,000,000,000 per year, distributed among various classes of production; agriculture, over $17,000,000,000; industry, in excess of $63,000,000,000; mining, approximately $6,000,000,000; and other products in lesser quantities. Foreign producers, who in many instances can obtain raw materials at lower prices than American producers, and who pay for labor less than 40 per cent, on the average, of what is paid in the United States, look longingly toward this market, and desire to enter it upon the best possible terms. This is a laudable desire. But we regard the protection of the American market and of our producers and laborers as a domestic question to be settled in such way and on such terms of trade as we deem advisable. We alone have a right to say what shall happen in this market and the conditions on which outsiders may enter in trade.

During this readjustment several foreign nations have disclosed a great interest in behalf of the trade of their nationals and to this we have no objection. Our country does and should take a like interest in behalf of our own nationals. However, neither the representatives of foreign governments nor of foreign producers were heard at the hearings. The Committee on Ways and Means, acting as the agent of the House and of the Republican Party in the country, have welcomed all information that they might be as well informed as possible on all matters affecting the tariff. We have no intention of excluding foreign products from the market of the United States, but it is the purpose to admit them under such conditions and in such quantities as not to throttle our industries, imperil our wage scales, and impede our development. As a fundamental fact domestic competition is more vital in regulating prices in this country than foreign imports. The cases of tin plate, steel, aluminum, and other products may be cited. The foreign goods sent to this country naturally and legitimately sell for what the market will bring irrespective of the costs of production. In cases where the competition between the foreign and domestic articles is keen and there is a desire on the part of the foreign producers to control the American market, especially in the case of articles designed and manufactured for the American market, they will sell at prices below that for which the American products can be sold. We found instances of that during our present readjustment. But where such is not the purpose the products are generally sold for the most that they will bring irrespective of the production costs. Why should they not sell? We believe that since we have created this great market and maintain it, providing all the legal and commercial machinery for its use and protection, that foreigners who pay no taxes in the United States, but who desire to participate in the benefits of this market and the sale of whose products will tend to injure American producers and labor, that we are entirely justified in charging them an entry price that will prevent disaster to our people and will put into the Treasury of the United States considerable sums of money and thus relieve our own taxpayers to that extent.

Under the protective policy during the last six years our foreign trade has greatly increased with a corresponding increase in the amount of money received from customs duties approximating $600,000,000 a year. Our foreign trade has practically doubled under the act of 1922 and has remained so, and is the largest in the peace-time history of our country.

For, after all, taking into consideration all the factors involved, the fundamental economic basis of our national progress and prosperity is production in its various forms.

Whoever finds more economic ways of producing goods, wares, and commodities increases their use, reduces them in price, and makes them more generally available, so that a human life earns more enjoyment and secures better opportunities, is a public benefactor. Such an agency is protection.

Foreigners have no natural right to trade in our markets. It is a privilege granted under the comity of nations.

The rates in a tariff bill are intended to adjust the differences in competitive conditions in this country and abroad to give the American producer and American laborer proper opportunity in the American market, based on the experience of a given period, due consideration being given to the history of imports over a period of several years. The quantities produced and the prices received fluctuate from year to year and from season to season. A duty is based upon an average experience. A fluctuation in price affects the effectiveness of a duty. In other words, the effectiveness of a duty depends upon the market. Without a careful examination of the market for a given period it is not possible to say to what per cent a duty was effective. A duty may be wholly effective at one time and only partially so at another, depending upon the market. But as the need for protection increases the effectiveness of a duty increases up to the limit provided.

The 1,100 witnesses presented many requests for readjustments. Modifications in existing law are to be made only to the extent that, and only in cases where, the facts as ascertained warrant. Witnesses were urged at the hearings to submit evidence showing the difference in competitive conditions here and abroad as the basis for the consideration of their requests for adjusted duties.

Speaking generally, a rate of duty expresses the difference between production costs at home and abroad for that material part of the total production with which foreign competition is most effective and in which management is fairly efficient. It may be sufficient in the case of better managed or more favorably located plants, and at times insufficient for less effective management or inferior location. Tariffs can not take the place of sound management or suitable location.

It would appear that these questions are more in evidence than at former hearings.

In determining the rate of duty to be imposed it is necessary to decide what conditions of American production will form the basis. I speak especially concerning manufacturing enterprises. Plants are located in various parts of the country. Each section has advantages and disadvantages, of which four may be cited:

1. Proximity to raw material.
2. Proximity to fuel or power.
3. Proximity to markets.
4. Facilities of transportation.

Presupposing management to be equally efficient in the several instances, a plant so located as to be near raw material, close to its supply of fuel or power, near to markets and with moderate freight burdens, and near to an adequate labor supply, other things being equal, has a distinct advantage; and one distant from labor, from raw materials, from fuel and power, and from markets with consequent high freight burdens, has a distinct disadvantage. Plants having only some of the advantages will be beneficially located in proportion to the advantages possessed. Production costs will vary with the advantages availed of. A duty sufficient only for the most favorably located plants might tend to their benefit at the expense of their less favorably located domestic competitors. Plants least favorably located have the status of marginal producers who tend to disappear. That is, unless careful consideration is given, a tariff may have a tendency to redistribute production. Our opponents charge that a high tariff promotes monopoly. It seems to me that our experience proves the contrary so far as domestic production is concerned. A low tariff might tend toward monopoly under the conditions cited above. No general rule can be stated. Each such situation must be studied on its merits, and the rate of duty fixed to foster sufficient production without unnecessary interference with domestic conditions. Overproduction involves problems in the solution of which the tariff is only one factor.

Experience indicates, however, that in the great majority of instances foreign competition is keener in certain localities than in others. When such storm centers are accurately located, whatever rate of duty will be sufficient for them will also take care of all the others. Problems stated above cause tariff makers many difficulties and serious hours of investigation and study, for tariffs deal not alone with foreign competition but also may affect domestic competition.

Industries which establish the sites of their plants without proper reference to the sources of their raw materials, markets for their products, and without due consideration for transportation and freight rates and the opportunity to employ suitable labor have assumed unusual risks.

Those producers who have their raw materials, including fuel or power, their markets and labor supply near at hand, and whose transportation costs are low, are most favorably located. But these are few. Those who have one of the three are probably at an advantage, and those who locate without reference to markets, materials, including power or fuel, or labor, are usually at the greatest disadvantage. The above are general statements, to all of which it is possible to find striking exceptions. Well-located businesses may be poorly managed, and those disadvantageously located may be brilliantly conducted.

The point I am emphasizing is both the difficulty and necessity in determining what rate of duty should be imposed for any industry or product as a whole that it may operate fairly and promote a production adequate for our needs, country-wide.

There are some new factors in competitive conditions. Italy and Czechoslovakia are becoming significant factors in world trade. The use of new and improved machinery abroad, manned by foreigners trained in our factories, or by Americans so trained, is increasing; and foreign labor is materially increasing in efficiency, with no corresponding increase in standards of living. Such labor also receives 40 per cent or less, on the general average, of wages paid here. This increased efficiency, with lower standards of living and low pay, makes a distinctly new factor in competitive conditions, and is of especial importance to American labor. Immense amounts of American capital are invested abroad, presumably to take advantage of the opportunities conditions above indicated afford.

It is frequently asked that consideration be given to foreign products produced by Americans who have invested their capital abroad, when imported into this country. But since they buy their materials abroad, use lower paid foreign labor, and enrich foreign communities, such products can not be given any preference. They are foreign competitors and can become the most dangerous of such competitors.

A protective tariff can benefit only such American products as enter our home markets for consumption or manufacture. It can not affect our goods, wares, and commodities after they leave our shores and enter international trade.

The tariff is a domestic question, involving trade in our home markets. Who are entitled to preference in them? Obviously the persons who made them. Who made and support them? Our own people. Moreover, the right to control its domestic affairs without foreign interference is an attribute of sovereignty of which no nation can divest itself and retain its political independence. Only a nation that is economically independent can be truly politically free.

And may I say in passing that in my opinion the most effective and satisfactory relief that agriculture can receive is not the opportunity to borrow more of other people's money nor any form of aid affording temporary relief, with a consequent increased burden when the day of settlement arrives, but for the farmers to receive money of their own by obtaining remunerative prices for their crops.

A number of the representatives of labor and labor organizations appeared at the hearings and, without exception, as I recall, earnestly urged the levying of duties adequate to protect the manufacturer, the farmer, and the wage earner, affirming that in this their interests were mutual. Recent investigations have shown that labor abroad receives only 40 per cent or less of the American wage scales. The American workingman is unable to maintain our standard of living on foreign wage scales. His fight to protect his home and fireside is entirely justified and characteristically American.

It is remarkable how our foreign competitors can select the items in a schedule upon which successful attack can be made because an inadequate duty opens the way for an effective competitor. When this is the case the imports come in. The plumes of smoke fade from our stacks, the hum of industry ceases, trains no longer bring raw materials and carry away finished products, pay rolls cease, industrious American workingmen become idle, and practically every person in the local communities feels the loss in some degree.

At times persons who have not thought the matter through refer to "consumers" or the "consuming public" as if they were a class apart from the rest of the people. All our people are equally consumers and producers who are engaged in any useful or gainful occupation; and only such as the idle, the criminal, etc., are consumers only.

Benefits of the tariff are gradually distributed to our people. Suppose a duty is placed upon certain industrial products—production of such articles increases in the United States; more raw material is purchased for their manufacture; and more labor is employed, with more hours' work per year; the price to the American consumer is reduced. Meanwhile the more steady employment of labor at better wages causes larger amounts of commodities to be purchased and consumed, the business of merchants increases, and larger quantities of farm products find a favorable market.

Or, to state it in another way, every duty is a spring of pure water of industrial life, pouring forth its beneficial flood, and the united results of all duties make the rising tide of American prosperity.

BRIDGES AND BRIDGE LEGISLATION

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of bridges and bridge legislation, I insert herewith an article on that subject prepared by myself and recently published in the United States Daily.

The article is as follows:

JURISDICTION OVER BRIDGES

The Federal Government has complete and exclusive jurisdiction over all of the navigable waters of the United States for purposes of commerce and navigation.

Under the Constitution of England, jurisdiction over all navigable waterways of the realm belonged to the Crown, and this jurisdiction applied likewise to the navigable waters of the Crown colonies, including those in America. When the American Colonies won their independence from England, this jurisdiction over the navigable waterways of the different Colonies passed to the colonial or State governments.

The State governments granted that jurisdiction to the Federal Government by the commerce clause of the Constitution. Therefore, since the adoption of our Constitution the courts have uniformly held that the United States has complete and exclusive jurisdiction over all of its navigable waters.

Until the Federal Government chose to assert its jurisdiction by appropriate legislation, the courts recognized a concurrent jurisdiction of the Federal and State Governments over those navigable waterways lying within the respective States. But in the river and harbors act of Congress, approved March 3, 1899, the Federal Government asserted its jurisdiction in section 9 thereof, which provided in part as follows:

"That it shall not be lawful to construct or commence the construction of any bridge, dam, dike, or causeway, over or in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other navigable waters of the United States until the consent of Congress to the building of such structures shall have been obtained and until the plans for the same shall have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War."

It was further provided in section 10 thereof as follows: "That the creation of any obstruction not affirmatively authorized by Congress, to the navigable capacity of any of the waters of the United States is hereby prohibited; and it shall not be lawful to build or commence the building of any wharf, pier, dolphin, boom, weir, breakwater, bulkhead, jetty, or other structures in any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, navigable river, or other water of the United States, outside established harbor lines, or where no harbor lines have been established, except on plans recommended by the Chief of Engineers, and authorized by the Secretary of War; and it shall not be lawful to excavate or fill, or in any manner to alter or modify the course, location, condition, or capacity of any port, roadstead, haven, harbor, canal, lake, harbor of refuge, or inclosure within the United States, unless the work has been recommended by the Chief of Engineers and authorized by the Secretary of War prior to beginning the same."

Appropriate penalties were provided for any violation of that act and since then the courts have uniformly held that by this action

Congress has asserted its complete and exclusive constitutional jurisdiction over all the navigable waterways of the country; and no bridge or other structure has been or can be built over any of the navigable waterways without the consent of Congress.

In the act of March 3, 1899, Congress delegated to the various State governments it power to consent to and approve of the construction of bridges and other structures over navigable waterways of the country under certain circumstances; it provided in section 9 of that act that such structures might be built across rivers and other waterways with the consent and approval of the State governments where the navigable portions of such waterways lie wholly within the limits of a single State; but even in such cases such structures can not be built until the location and plans thereof are submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before construction is begun.

This delegation by Congress to the State legislatures of its power to consent to and approve the construction of bridges or other structures over the navigable waterways which lie wholly within the limits of a single State has proven to be unfortunate, and that part of the act of 1899 ought to be repealed as soon as possible.

It was a mistake for Congress to delegate to any one any part of its constitutional control over the navigable waterways of the United States. It will be noticed that Congress only partially delegated this authority to the State legislatures, for the act specifically provided that where such structures are built by the consent or approval of the State legislature the location and plans thereof must still be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War.

Nevertheless, that act ought to be repealed because the State legislatures have not heretofore and do not now fully protect the interest of the public in granting their consent to the construction of bridges over navigable waters within their borders.

Congress has for some years adopted certain limitations and conditions which are inserted in all bridge franchises granted by Congress which will protect the public from exploitation and imposition where bridges are constructed by private persons with the privileges of collecting tolls for their use. The result is that shrewd business men who wish to avoid the conditions and restrictions that are imposed by Congress construct such bridges under State laws, where the navigable portion of the river to be bridged lies wholly within the limits of a single State.

But in respect to all of the larger rivers and more important waterways of the United States, those which form the boundary lines between States or which flow from one State to another, the consent of Congress is necessary before any bridge, dam, or other structure can be built over them. Such consent is given in the form of a franchise commonly known as a bridge bill.

Bridge bills are prepared by the Members of the House and Senate upon the request of their constituents; are referred in the House to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and in the Senate to the Committee on Commerce, and after hearings by those committees must be approved by them and by the House and Senate and finally approved by the President before the bridge authorized by them can be lawfully constructed.

GENERAL BRIDGE LEGISLATION

Before 1906 every bridge bill passed by Congress fixed the exact location of the bridge and provided in more or less detail for the location of piers, the width of the spans, the vertical clearances above high water, and other specifications for the construction of the bridge.

In 1906 Congress passed a general bridge law under which all bridges have been constructed since then. Section 1 of the act of March 23, 1906, provides as follows:

"That when, hereafter, authority is granted by Congress to any persons to construct and maintain a bridge across or over any of the navigable waters of the United States, such bridge shall not be built or commenced until the plans and specifications for its construction, together with such drawings of the proposed construction and such map of the proposed location as may be required for a full understanding of the subject, have been submitted to the Secretary of War and Chief of Engineers for their approval, nor until they shall have approved such plans and specifications and the location of such bridge and accessory works; and when the plans for any bridge to be constructed under the provisions of this act have been approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War it shall not be lawful to deviate from such plans, either before or after completion of the structure, unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and received the approval of the Chief of Engineers and of the Secretary of War."

And section 4 provides in part as follows: "That no bridge erected or maintained under the provisions of this act shall at any time unreasonably obstruct the free navigation of the waters over which it is constructed, and if any bridge erected in accordance with the provisions of this act shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, at any time unreasonably obstruct such navigation, either on account of insufficient height, width of span, or otherwise, or if there be difficulty in passing the draw opening or the draw span of such bridge by rafts, steamboats, or other water craft, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, after giving the parties interested reasonable opportunity to be heard, to notify the persons owning or controlling such bridge to so alter the same as to render navigation through or under it reasonably free, easy, and unobstructed, stating in such notice the changes required to be made, and prescribing in each case a reasonable time in which to make such changes, and if at the end of the time so specified the changes so required have not been made, the persons owning or controlling such bridge shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this act; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions shall be removed at the expense of the persons owning or operating said bridge.

"The persons owning or operating any such bridge shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe. If the bridge shall be constructed with a draw, then the draw shall be opened promptly by the persons owning or operating such bridge upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats and other water craft."

By this law Congress assigned to the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War the consideration of all engineering questions connected with the construction of bridges. So that since March 23, 1906, Congress merely determines the policy as to whether or not a bridge should be authorized when and where requested.

If Congress consents to or authorizes its construction, the plans and specifications for the bridge must still be submitted to the Chief of Engineers and approved by him before the bridge can be constructed.

The question is sometimes asked, Why should the time of Congress be taken up with the consideration of bridge bills? Why should not Congress delegate to some responsible Government agency the duty of passing upon and consenting to the construction of all bridges?

The answer is that it is one of the most important functions of the Federal Government to not only guard and preserve from all obstructions all of our navigable waterways in the interest of the commerce of the country, but to improve them in order to provide a more economical transportation system for the future requirement of our commerce.

Congress has never been willing to delegate this important duty to any agency except the one referred to in the preceding article where the navigable portion of the waterway lies wholly within the borders of a single State; in such cases Congress has authorized bridges to be built with the consent of the legislature of the State.

WATERWAYS, THE NATION'S NATURAL HIGHWAYS

The rivers and other navigable waters of the country are the Nation's natural highways. They were our only means of transportation in the early years when there were no railroads or improved highways. With the development and growth of the railroads, transportation on our waterways declined or was entirely destroyed; but the time has come when our inland waterways must be improved and transportation restored thereon in order to provide cheaper transportation to meet the necessities of our industrial and economic development.

It is, therefore, of the greatest importance that no bridges or other structures be authorized over any of the navigable waters of the country except upon conditions which will fully safeguard all the future interests of navigation.

It will be but a few years until our more important inland waterways will be among our busiest channels of commerce, and it is the duty of the Government to see to it that no bridges or other structures are permitted which will in the future unnecessarily or unreasonably obstruct or endanger the free passage of commerce thereon.

The question is sometimes asked, what constitutes a navigable waterway. That is a question both of law and of fact. Many or our inland waterways are navigable in law although they may not be navigable in fact.

When the question arises with reference to any particular waterway, the decision as to whether it is a navigable waterway must be made in the first instance by the Secretary of War.

In the office of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department full information concerning the history of all of the waterways of the country has been gathered and preserved. If a particular river has at any time been used for transporting commerce or for travel, however primitive the commerce or methods of travel may have been, it is classed as a navigable waterway, although it may not be susceptible of navigation by modern methods.

Most of our rivers have at one time or another been used for some form of transportation and are, therefore, classed as navigable waterways. They can and may be improved and made navigable by modern methods of transportation and, therefore, Congress ought not to delegate to any agency of the Government its right to control the construction of bridges over them, except under the most careful and guarded regulations and restrictions.

Five or six years ago an investment banker, testifying before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, stated that up to that time the investment bankers of the country were unwilling to recommend bridge securities to their clients for investment; he said they considered such securities too hazardous and uncertain for safe investments.

Later this same banker testified before the same committee that conditions had so changed with the construction of concrete highways and the growth of the automobile industry that investment bankers were glad to finance the construction of properly located highway bridges.

Since 1916 the Federal Government has been aiding the States in the construction of hard-surfaced highways. For a number of years Congress has been contributing at the rate of $75,000,000 a year. Practically all of the States are now engaged in a progressive policy of improving their highways.

These State highways, under Federal supervision, are being connected into well-planned systems of through highways; and with the marvelous development of the motor industry and the rapid growth of transportation of both passengers and freight by motor power, the necessity for improved and safer methods of crossing the rivers and other navigable waters of the country has become more and more apparent. People will no longer submit to the delays and the inconveniences of crossing the rivers of the country by the old antiquated ferries.

There is an increasing demand from all over the country for the construction of highway bridges, and this public sentiment reaches Congress daily in the form of requests for the passage of bills granting franchises for the construction of such bridges. At each session of Congress several hundred of such bills are filed which require the prompt and careful consideration of the committees of the House and Senate.

Until in comparatively recent years the Congress was rarely ever asked to pass a bill granting its consent for the construction of a vehicular bridge. The only bridges that were built were railroad bridges, except now and then a vehicular bridge in some metropolitan area like New York or St. Louis or between other large cities.

But now there is a demand for the construction of highway bridges wherever improved roads cross our waterways. Shrewd business men have sensed the possibility of large profits in the construction of bridges located at the important crossings of our highways and rivers, and they hurry to Congress with requests for franchises authorizing the construction of bridges at such points.

TOLL BRIDGES

Modern highway bridges are very expensive improvements. The cost of constructing hard-surfaced highways has risen higher and higher, until it now taxes the ingenuity of the State governments to find methods of raising the money necessary to even moderately improve their highway systems. But highway bridges, constructed of steel and concrete, of sufficient strength to bear with safety the heavy commerce that will pass over them and resist the floods and ice jams that frequent our rivers, are very expensive structures.

A proposal is now pending to construct a highway bridge across San Francisco Bay, which the evidence has shown will cost between $75,000,000 and $100,000,000. A bridge has been authorized over Tampa Bay which will cost $15,000,000 or $20,000,000; and another bridge is now being constructed across the river at Detroit which will cost nearly $30,000,000.

Another is now being constructed over the Hudson River at New York which has been estimated to cost $150,000,000. Bridges over the Mississippi River or the Ohio River cost from one to six million dollars.

How are such structures to be financed? Who will furnish the money to construct them? Should they be built by the State governments and the burden placed upon all the people of the State through general taxes? Or should private capital be allowed to build them?

These are questions that are agitating the public mind to-day and are causing no little worry to the Members of Congress who are called upon each session to grant franchises for the construction of bridges.

Of course, it is fundamental that all of us want our highways free. No person traveling by motor on a highway or transporting freight or passengers thereon likes to be stopped and compelled to pay before he can proceed. In earlier years the States were unwilling or unable to raise funds to improve their highways and private capital was allowed to build hard-surfaced roads and collect tolls for their use.

Toll roads, always an annoyance, became in the course of time more or less burdensome and unpopular until public sentiment compelled their discontinuance.

It is sometimes stated that bridges are parts of our highway systems and ought to be just as free as the highways themselves. This is true or not true, depending upon the location of the bridges.

Intrastate bridges located on the State highways over the smaller waterways ought undoubtedly to be constructed by the States from public funds in the same manner as the State highways are constructed, because they are in fact, and ought to be, parts of the State highway systems. But interstate bridges constructed over the larger rivers and arms of the sea, which constitute the boundary lines between our country and neighboring countries, or between different States, are not in fact parts of the highway systems of those States. And there are many who believe that the States ought not to levy taxes upon their people to construct such important interstate or international structures; at least, not until they have completed and paid for their own intrastate highways and bridges.

Now these expensive international or interstate highway bridges and the more expensive bridges over arms of the sea, like Tampa Bay and San Francisco Bay, can only be constructed (1) by the States, or (2) by the United States, or (3) by private persons or corporations acting under franchises granted by Congress.

There are some who advocate the construction of such bridges by the Federal Government. They argue that the Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction over these great waterways; that they are the Nation's highways granted to the Federal Government by the States; that with the development of our modern highway systems and the growth of motor transportation thereon these waterways constitute barriers to the transportation of commerce on the highways; and that therefore the Federal Government should bridge them in the interest of such commerce.

The obvious answer to this argument is that if the Federal Government should ever embark upon the policy of building bridges, the burden on the Treasury would soon stagger the imagination.

For a number of years Congress has been contributing $75,000,000 a year to aid the States in the construction of highways, and this policy will apparently continue indefinitely; but if Congress should begin appropriating money from the Public Treasury to construct bridges the amount required would in the course of years approach the amount expended in the World War.

With our national expenditures now amounting to between three and four billion dollars a year, and increasing from year to year even under the most rigid economy, it is obvious that the Federal Government can not and ought not to enter upon a policy of constructing bridges over the navigable waterways, and none who know these conditions are so sanguine as to believe that Congress will do so.

Shall these more expensive bridges then be constructed by the States or municipalities, or shall they be constructed by private individuals with private capital? If constructed by the States or municipalities they must be constructed from public funds, and can be constructed and operated either as free bridges or toll bridges. If constructed by private individuals they must necessarily be constructed with private capital and be operated as toll bridges.

There is a natural prejudice in the minds of many people against the payment of any kind of tolls, and certain public officials and politicians have been persistently appealing to this popular prejudice to prevent by law the use of private capital for the construction of toll bridges. This prejudice against payment of tolls seems to be due to several causes.

The word "toll" is derived from the Greek word "telos," which means a tax, and has usually been applied to stipends or charges collected for the enjoyment of privileges. People naturally object to the payment of any tax, but especially to the payment of a tax or toll charged for the enjoyment of a privilege.

Then when private capital was permitted to construct turnpikes or improved highways and tolls were charged for their use, such charges became more and more unpopular, until the opposition to them compelled the discontinuance of toll roads.

This prejudice against the collection of tolls for the use of the highways persists as an inheritance from our fathers and is to-day being invoked by those who seek to arouse opposition to the construction of toll bridges. One cause of this prejudice against the payment of tolls is the method of collecting them. Like many other taxes, the people would not object to them if they could be concealed by some indirect method of payment. But we naturally resent having to stop on a highway and pay a tax. That was one of the fundamental reasons for the prejudice against toll roads. And it is likewise the fundamental objection to toll bridges.

People traveling on the highways do not like to be stopped and required to pay a charge before they can proceed. If the tax for the use of a modern highway bridge could in some manner be collected by the month or by the year, instead of having to be paid each time the bridge is crossed, much of the opposition to toll bridges would disappear, because the public recognizes as just the principle that those who use a bridge should pay for it.

But so long as the tax or toll for the use of the highway bridge is collected by stopping people at the entrance of the bridge and requiring payment before proceeding there will be a prejudice against that form of tax, and such prejudice will be capitalized by those who believe in Government ownership and operation of all public utilities and who are opposed to the investment of private capital therein.

PRIVATELY OWNED TOLL BRIDGES

Privately owned toll bridges are in many respects like privately owned electric light plants, gas plants, water plants, and street-car systems. They are public utilities privately owned.

They furnish conveniences and services to the public for which the public is required to pay. And rates are or may be regulated by public authority and must be just and reasonable. If unreasonable rates are charged, complaint can be filed and the rates will be reduced.

The act of Congress passed March 23, 1906, provides that where tolls are charged for the use of any bridge constructed after the passage of that act, such tolls must be just and reasonable, and if they are not just and reasonable they may be made so by public authority.

In other words, the tolls charged on all toll bridges constructed under authority of Congress since March 23, 1906, can be regulated just like the rates charged by privately owned electric light, or gas, or water, or street railroad companies can be regulated.

There is a difference of opinion in this country with reference to the ownership and operation of public utilities. There are some who believe that all public utilities ought to be publicly owned and operated, and that private capital should not be allowed to invest in or to operate such utilities.

There are certain officials connected with the Bureau of Roads of the Department of Agriculture who hold this view, and have for several years carried on a campaign among the State highway commissions and through the public press to arouse public sentiment against further permitting the construction of privately owned toll bridges.

Propaganda has been sent out from Washington by the public-ownership advocates, and every effort has been made to encourage and induce the various State highway commissions and Members of Congress to prevent the further granting of franchises authorizing the construction of bridges by private individuals. Appeals have been made to the State highway commissions to themselves obtain franchises and construct highway bridges; and where they have no funds to do so and none can be obtained, they are urged to borrow money on the credit of the States and construct toll bridges.

In some States there are legal or constitutional limitations which prevent the State highway commissions from borrowing on public credit for the construction of bridges, and in such States the highway commissions are being urged to borrow money from private bankers to construct toll bridges and secure the loans by pledges of the tolls without pledging the credit of the States. Those who entertain these views would resort to any device to bring about the construction of all bridges by public authorities and even operate them as toll bridges, rather than permit their construction and operation by private individuals with private capital.

On the other hand, there are many who approve the policy of permitting the private ownership and operation of public utilities under proper public regulation. Ours is the wealthiest of all nations. The banks are filled to overflowing with the accumulated savings of the people. Almost unlimited private capital is seeking investment. Our people have in recent years been investing nearly $2,000,000,000 a year in foreign countries, and much of it in public utilities. Why should not this surplus capital be invested in public utilities for the service of the people of this country?

The legitimate expenses of our National, State, and municipal Governments have been substantially increasing in recent years and the growth of our public and municipal indebtedness has almost reached staggering proportions. There are many who believe that it is a wiser policy to permit the investment of private capital in properly regulated public utilities rather than to further increase the burden of public debts in order to provide the people with the public utilities which their needs require.

Reference has been made to the turnpikes or toll roads of former years and the prejudice that arose against the collection of tolls which finally resulted in their discontinuance.

Yet strange as it may seem, we have to-day returned to the same principle of collecting tolls or taxes for the privilege of using the public highways; but we are collecting such taxes in different forms. I refer to the motor license fee and the gasoline tax which have now been adopted in almost every State in the Union.

What is the automobile license fee of to-day but a tax or a toll for the privilege of using the States' improved highways? What is the gasoline tax but a tax or toll charged the operators of motor cars for the privilege of using the highways? The principle of the turnpike toll of former years was that those who enjoy the use of an improved highway should pay for the privilege. Is not that the same principle which justifies the automobile license fee and the gasoline tax of to-day?

The only difference between the payment of tolls for crossing an improved highway bridge and the payment of a motor license or a gasoline tax consists in the method of collecting the toll or tax. Bridge tolls are collected by requiring the traveler on the highway to stop at the bridge and pay the toll. The license fee is generally paid by the year, and the gasoline tax is paid to the gasoline dealer as part of the purchase price when the traveler buys his gasoline.

If the bridge is privately owned there is, of course, the further difference that the bridge toll is paid to an individual who has a franchise for that purpose, while the license fee or gasoline tax is paid to the State.

But the fundamental principle beneath the bridge toll, the license fee, and the gasoline tax is the same, namely, that those who enjoy the benefits and conveniences of the improved hard-surfaced highways, and the improved highway bridges ought to pay for them, rather than distribute the burden of paying for such improvements through general taxes which will fall upon people who do not enjoy them as well as those who do.

There is a sound argument in favor of the policy of requiring those who enjoy the conveniences and the benefits of improved highways and bridges to pay for them. There is likewise a sound argument in favor of not assessing the cost of such improvements upon the people who do not use and enjoy them. The fundamental justice of these arguments is evidenced by the popularity of the gasoline tax and the universal practice of collecting substantial motor license fees.

Much of the objection to the collection of highway bridge tolls would disappear if such tolls could be collected in the same manner as the gasoline tax is collected, and thereby avoid the necessity of stopping people on the highways and collecting for each passage over the bridge.

But the argument is sometimes advanced that when sufficient tolls have been collected to pay the expenses of operating the bridge to amortize its cost, the bridge should be made free; and it would be in the interest of the public, of course, if that result could be brought about. But the same argument could just as well be advanced with reference to the motor license fee and the gasoline tax.

In some States the motor license fees amount to as much as $20,000,000, and their gasoline tax much more than that. It might just as well be said that when the cost of improved highways has been realized from the collection of motor license fees and the gasoline tax, that such taxes should be abolished. Yet we do not find that any of the State laws authorizing the collection of these fees and taxes contain any provision for their termination.

The fact is, the motor license fee and the gasoline tax are permanent taxes. Instead of being terminated when the roads are paid for, they will be continued as long as improved roads are maintained, and the tendency will be to increase them, because such taxes are easy to collect, and they are fundamentally just; and, in the case of the gasoline tax, the tax is concealed in the price of the gasoline.

On the other hand, bridge tolls can not be concealed; they are an inconvenience and an annoyance to the traveling public, and the fact that in the case of privately owned bridges the tolls have to be paid to private parties or corporations rather than to the State shocks the sensibilities of the advocates of Government ownership and brings forth general condemnation of toll bridges.

POLICY OF CONGRESS TOWARD TOLL BRIDGES

Congress has in recent years established a rather definite policy with reference to franchises for toll bridges. This policy may be briefly stated as follows:

First, we encourage the construction of highway bridges by public authorities wherever it can be done. If a bill is filed to grant a franchise to an individual or corporation, the Member filing the bill is requested by the committee to furnish information as to whether or not the State or the county or city in which the bridge is located is or is likely to be in a position to construct the bridge. Unless the bridge committee is convinced that the bridge can not or will not be constructed by public authority, the franchise will not be granted to the private individual or corporation.

It is only when it is made to appear to the bridge committee that a bridge is needed at the point in question and that it can not or will not likely be constructed by public authority, that the bill granting the franchise to a private individual or corporation is favorably recommended to Congress. If one application for a bridge franchise is filed by public authority and another by a private individual or corporation, preference is given to the public authority.

But where a bridge is needed in the interest of commerce on the highway and the people of the community want the bridge constructed, there is no sound reason why private capital should not be allowed to construct it under the conditions which Congress now imposes if the public authorities can not or will not do so.

Second, Congress does not grant or recognize any monopoly in crossing any of the navigable waterways of the country. If there is an existing toll bridge at a highway crossing and a franchise is requested for the construction of another, either free or toll, the franchise will be granted. If two or more individuals or companies ask franchises for the construction of bridges at the same vicinity, they are granted.

Under this policy bridge franchises ought not to have any speculative value. Such franchises are expressly made assignable or transferable, because conditions might arise which would make it necessary to transfer them.

Occasionally unscrupulous promoters obtain bridge franchises and then try to sell them for substantial profits, and such cases are cited as an argument against granting of bridge franchises to private individuals.

There is no way, of course, by which Congress can prevent unscrupulous men from imposing upon others by selling bridge franchises, nor by which gullible investors can be protected from such improvident investments. There is no reason why anyone should pay any person any substantial amount for a mere bridge franchise, because the party desiring the franchise can come to Congress and obtain one without cost.

Third, the general bridge law provides that if tolls are charged for the use of a highway bridge they must be just and reasonable; if unjust or unreasonable tolls are charged, the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers will, upon complaint, cause an investigation to be made and fix the tolls at rates that will be just and reasonable. This law applies to every bridge that has been built under the authority of Congress since March 23, 1906.

Occasionally attention is called to some toll bridge where unreasonable tolls are being collected and unreasonable profits being earned, and such cases are cited and emphasized as an argument against the granting of of franchises for privately owned toll bridges. If a toll bridge was built before March 23, 1906, there is no law regulating the tolls that can be charged.

But the act of March 23, 1906, provides for the regulation of tolls on all bridges constructed under authority of Congress after that date. The instances cited where unreasonable tolls are being charged and unreasonable profits being realized are usually old toll bridges that were built before 1906. But there is no reason why the owners of any bridge constructed under authority of Congress since March 23, 1906, should be permitted to collect unreasonable tolls or to realize unreasonable profits.

If anyone interested should file a complaint with the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers an investigation would be made and the tolls would be reduced to a fair and reasonable basis.

The fact that selfish men sometimes abuse their privileges and impose upon the public by collecting unfair tolls for the use of toll bridges is no valid argument against the granting of franchises for the construction of toll bridges with private capital. The law provides a remedy for such abuses and they can be stopped any time the public desires to have them stopped.

Fourth, Congress grants no franchises to private individuals to construct toll bridges that can not be terminated any time the public wishes to terminate them. Every toll bridge that has been authorized by Congress in recent years can be recaptured by the State or county or city in which it is located at any time by purchase or condemnation.

This is not true of toll bridges that were authorized in former years. There are many instances in this country where privately owned toll bridges were constructed in former years at crossings where Federal-aid highways have since been located; and heavy traffic and travel over the highways have made such bridges very profitable and their earnings have given them very great values. The owners of such bridges have sometimes exploited the public and have refused to sell the bridges to the State at anything like a reasonable price.

To avoid such conditions Congress has in recent years expressly provided for the recapture of all privately owned toll bridges. If a bridge is located wholly within the borders of a single State it can be taken over by condemnation by the State whenever it wishes to do so. But in the case of interstate bridges a different question arises. No State can acquire by condemnation any part of a bridge that is not within its own jurisdiction.

But in every bridge bill that has been passed by Congress in recent years granting authority to private capital to build a bridge, authority has been granted to the State or States in which the bridge is located, or their political subdivisions, to acquire the bridge at any time by purchase or condemnation by paying its reasonable value. And in addition to that all bills granting franchises to private individuals carry a further provision to the effect that if at any time after the expiration of 5, 10, or 15 years (the time depending upon the location and the size of the bridge) the bridge is acquired by the State by condemnation, the measure of damages is limited to the actual cost of construction less a reasonable deduction for depreciation, the actual expenditures for necessary improvements, the cost of real estate necessary for its construction, and not to exceed 10 per cent of its cost for financing and promotion expenses.

In other words, after a limited number of years as above stated, every privately owned toll bridge that has been authorized by Congress in recent years, can be taken over by the State or States in which it is located, or by any political subdivision thereof, at any time by condemnation, and the measure of damages is fixed at the actual value of the physical structure at the time of condemnation. Nothing has to be paid for its earning power, or its value as a going profitable concern.

This policy fully protects the public against any kind of exploitation and unreasonable tolls; and any toll bridge constructed under franchises granted to-day can be terminated and taken over by the public at the actual value of the physical structure at any time the public desires to do so.

If a State wishes to condemn private property for public use the Constitution requires the payment of full value for the property. If a State should wish to condemn any other kind of public utility or any other kind of private business, it would have to pay not only the full value of its physical properties, but would have to pay for that added value which the business has acquired by reason of its earning power and its prospective profits.

But in the case of privately owned toll bridges, Congress protects the State from having to pay anything for the earning power of toll bridges when they condemn them and take them over, by appropriate provisions inserted in the franchises which the owner of the bridge agrees to because he is permitted to construct the bridge. By this policy Congress therefore gives the public a protection in the case of privately owned toll bridges that it does not have with reference to any other public utility.

Fifth, every toll-bridge franchise granted by Congress requires the owner, within 90 days after the completion of the bridge, to file with the Secretary of War and with the highway departments of the State or States in which the bridge is located, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge, the actual cost of real estate necessary for its construction, and the actual financing cost.

The Secretary of War is authorized at any time within three years after the completion of the bridge to investigate its cost and determine the accuracy and the reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement filed by the owners. The Secretary of War is also authorized to find the reasonable cost of the bridge and his finding is made conclusive upon all parties for the purpose of recapture if the State or any of its political subdivisions should ever wish to take over the bridge by purchase or condemnation.

Thus the padding or exaggeration of the costs of privately owned toll bridges is prevented. Sometimes it is alleged that bridge owners exaggerate or pad their costs in order to justify higher tolls and larger profits. The means of preventing this is provided in every franchise granted by Congress.

PROTECTION AGAINST ABUSES OF TOLL FRANCHISES

How does the present policy of Congress protect the public from unreasonable charges or other abuses when a franchise is granted for the construction of a privately owned toll bridge?

Briefly, the answer is as follows: First, by providing that all tolls must be just and reasonable and authorizing the Secretary of War at any time to fix them and make them just and reasonable.

Second, by granting authority to the State or States, or the county or counties, or the city or cities in which the bridge is located to acquire the bridge by purchase or condemnation at any time, and by limiting the measure of damages to the actual value of the physical structure at the time the bridge is acquired. Having acquired the bridge, the State or municipality can either make it free or reduce the tolls to a reasonable basis, as it may choose.

Third, by requiring the owner of the bridge to file an itemized sworn statement of its cost, and authorizing the Secretary of War to investigate the same and find the reasonable cost of the bridge. The findings of the Secretary of War are binding upon the owner of the bridge for the purpose of condemnation, as well as for the purpose of fixing the rates of toll. Thus a method is provided for preventing the dishonest or fraudulent padding of costs.

Finally, in every act granting a franchise to construct a bridge Congress expressly reserves the right to amend, alter, or repeal any of its provisions; so that if the owner of any toll bridge imposes unjust charges upon the public and there is no other remedy available, Congress can, and there is no doubt would, repeal the franchise or so alter it as to provide a remedy that would adequately stop the abuse.

At Cairo, Ill., a magnificent steel and concrete highway bridge over the Mississippi River that will cost over $3,000,000, is now nearing completion. At the same city another similar bridge over the Ohio River that will cost over $2,000,000 has been authorized.

Both of these bridges will be privately owned and operated as toll bridges. They are being constructed under franchises containing the safeguards that have just been discussed. When completed they will displace privately owned toll ferries that have been in operation almost a hundred years.

Other similar highway bridges have been constructed or are in the course of construction across the Mississippi River at Vicksburg, Natches, Cape Girardeau, Alton, Hannibal, and other places; and similar structures are being constructed across the Ohio River at numerous places between Pittsburgh and Cairo. These bridges will cost from one to six million dollars.

None of them can or would be constructed by the States with which they connect. Those States are now spending all of the money they can raise in the construction of their own highway systems and necessary bridges within their own jurisdictions.

Bridges over the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers are no parts of the highway systems of the States with which they connect. They are merely improved links which join together the highway systems of those States.

They are all being constructed as privately owned toll bridges under franchises granted by Congress. They are all located at important highway crossings where privately owned toll ferries have been in operation since white men first settled in the communities where they are located.

They all ought to be built to facilitate the transportation of interstate commerce. The tolls that will be charged for their use will be subject to regulation by the Federal Government. If the time comes when the people of the States where they are located want the tolls abolished and the bridges free, they have the authority to condemn them and acquire them by the payment of the actual value of the physical structure at the time they take them over.

Although they may in the years to come have a very great earning power on account of the growing travel and commerce of the country, yet if the States should wish to make them free they can do so without having to compensate their owners for the going value or the earning power which their favorable location on the highways and the increasing commerce of the country has given them.

What is true of these bridges is true in a large measure of all other privately owned bridges that have been authorized by Congress in recent years. They all displace privately owned toll ferries.

Generally speaking there are very few publicly owned ferries in this country. There may be a few that are owned by municipalities and operated for their own profit. Yet we hear no one advocating the public ownership of ferries, and we hear very few complaints against the private ownership of ferries. I do not recall hearing any general condemnation of privately owned toll ferries or any argument advocating free ferries.

Yet ferries are just as much a part of the highway systems of the States as are bridges; and there is no difference in principle between the payment of tolls for the use of an improved highway bridge and the payment of tolls for the use of a ferry.

But when Congress yields to popular demand and grants a franchise for a privately owned toll bridge to displace a privately owned toll ferry, and thereby provide a safe, quick, and convenient means of crossing the rivers, in the place of a slow, inadequate, and sometimes dangerous ferry, the advocates of public ownership come forward in magazines or newspapers and criticize Congress for bartering away the people's rights and giving to private capital the right to extoll tribute from the commerce of the country.

With the improvement of our highway systems and the tremendous growth in modern transportation thereon the people are demanding that the primitive and antiquated ferries be displaced by more modern and safer methods of crossing the rivers. These improvements could not be provided except under franchises granted by Congress; and in granting them Congress has endeavored to provide carefully, not only for full protection to navigation on the waterways, but also to provide adequate protection to the commerce of the highways.

We are endeavoring to encourage construction of free bridges by public authority where that can be done; but where the bridges can not be constructed by public authority, we permit the investment of private capital for that purpose under the restrictions and regulations heretofore mentioned which it is believed fully safeguard the public interest.

SAFEGUARDING TOLL-BRIDGE FRANCHISES

Occasionally attention is called by the newspapers to some privately owned toll bridge where enormous profits are being made, due to its fortunate location on a heavily traveled highway, and in some instances to excessive charges.

The Baltimore Sun, I believe, has called attention on one occasion to the Williamsport bridge across the Potomac River between Maryland and West Virginia. That paper is quoted as having said that the bridge was constructed at a cost of $87,000; that the company was capitalized at $100,000; that in 1924 the company paid a dividend of $24,000, or 24 per cent; in 1925 and 1926 it paid a dividend of $32,000, or 32 per cent; in 1927 it paid a dividend of $74,000, or 74 per cent, and also paid a stock dividend of $100,000, or 100 per cent; and that in 1928 it paid a dividend of $40,000, or 20 per cent on the increasing capitalization; and that this bridge has paid in dividends in five years two and one-third times its original investment.

The conclusion was drawn from this illustration that Congress should refuse to grant any more toll-bridge franchises and that there should be no private monopoly of bridges on publicly owned roads.

If the Baltimore Sun had been correctly quoted, that paper has rendered a distinct public service in calling attention to the abuse that the owners of this bridge are imposing upon the public. It seems that the bridge at Williamsport was started in 1908 and completed in 1909; it was built by the Washington & Berkley Building Co. under a charter granted by the State Legislature of West Virginia on February 18, 1908, and is now owned by the Washington & Williamsport Bridge Co., a corporation of Williamsport, Md.

This bridge was constructed across the Potomac River, which lies mostly within the State of Maryland, the boundary line between the States of West Virginia and Maryland being the low-water mark on the south side of the river. The Potomac River is a navigable waterway of the United States, and, therefore, the bridge could not be lawfully constructed without the consent of Congress.

The War Department advises me that this bridge was constructed without the consent of Congress, no act having been passed for that purpose. It further advises that the plans for the construction of the bridge were never submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War, as required by law. If the War Department is correct, then the Williamsport bridge has been from its beginning and is now an unlawful structure.

But though it is an unlawful structure, the Federal Government can not or would not act to have it removed unless it should be found to obstruct or interfere with or endanger navigation. But if it should at any time obstruct or endanger or interfere with navigation, the War Department could and probably would order it removed.

The principle of law is well established that the right to collect tolls for the use of a bridge or a highway is a privilege for which a franchise must be granted by the sovereign. If constructed within a State, the franchise must be granted by the State. If constructed over an interstate stream, the franchise must be granted by Congress.

The Williamsport bridge is constructed over a river which is on the boundary line between two States. All the traffic that passes over the bridge is, therefore, interstate traffic and the commerce that passes over it is interstate commerce. If it is true that this bridge was constructed without the consent of Congress, the owners of the bridge have never had any legal right to collect tolls for its use.

The bridge is located on a Federal-aid highway running from Hagerstown, Md., to Winchester, Va., and that road is recognized as a channel of interstate commerce over which the Federal Government has more or less jurisdiction under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

It may be, therefore, that the owners of the Williamsport bridge are unduly burdening interstate commerce over that highway by excessive tolls which realize unreasonable returns on their investment; and it is believed by able lawyers that the toll charges could be stopped or considerably reduced by appropriate proceedings before the courts if any who are prejudiced thereby should choose to pursue that remedy.

But the fact that excessive tolls may have been charged and excessive profits may have been realized at the Williamsport bridge, or at other bridges that might be cited, is no valid argument against granting franchises to others for the construction of toll bridges. Isolated abuses of public franchises do not prove that all similar franchises should be denied. The law provides a remedy for such abuses, and the public would be fully protected if the remedy provided by law were invoked and enforced.

COST OF TOLL BRIDGES

Articles have appeared in different publications and newspapers during the past year in which the claim has been repeatedly made that bridges can be constructed by public authorities much cheaper than they can be constructed by private capital, and that for that reason franchises for privately owned bridges should not be further granted by Congress.

These arguments have emanated from the United States Bureau of Roads and from legislative representatives of State highway commissions and automobile associations and perhaps others, who are advocates of Government ownership of public utilities, or who very naturally prefer to avoid the payment of tolls for crossing waterways.

It is natural for Federal or State road departments to feel that they can construct bridges more economically than private business concerns, and it is also natural that they should favor a policy which would increase their own activities and responsibilities. But most people who are conversant with Government activities know that no business can be conducted as economically by governments as by business concerns honestly managed. Government bureaus can not construct bridges more efficiently or more economically than private business concerns if the business concerns are in control of honest management.

Modern bridges, constructed to bear the burdens of the highway traffic of these days, ought not to be cheaply constructed. The safety of the public ought to receive first consideration. Honest individuals or business companies constructing highway bridges with their own or their stockholders' capital will naturally construct them as economically as they can be constructed with safety to the public.

The evil usually complained of, where bridges are constructed by private individuals or corporations, is not that they construct the bridges with less economy than they can be constructed by public authority, but rather that they sometimes pad their costs and make it appear that the bridge costs more than it actually did cost in order to afford a larger basis for the collection of tolls or for compensation in case the public should wish to acquire the bridge by condemnation.

But Congress now provides in all bridge bills authorizing construction of bridges by private capital that all contracts in excess of $5,000 shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, and the padding or undue enlargement of costs is prevented by requiring sworn itemized statements of all construction costs and authorizing the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers to investigate the statements filed and find what ought to be the reasonable cost of the bridge; and such finding is binding upon the owners as a basis for the fixing of tolls and for the recapture of the bridge by the public.

Under these provisions and restrictions bridges are being constructed by private capital just as efficiently and as economically as they can be constructed by public authorities. There is no justification for the claim that highway bridges can be constructed more economically by public authorities than by private business concerns, assuming that they are honestly managed.

There are many reasons why the general bridge law ought to be revised and amended so as to better provide for conditions that have arisen as the result of the development of our improved highway systems, and the great increase of motor transportation. The various provisions that have just been discussed, and perhaps others that might be suggested, to protect the public from unfair tolls and from the continued privilege of collecting tolls, as well as from fraudulent practices sometimes indulged in by dishonest promoters, ought to be written into the general bridge law rather than be inserted in the individual bridge bills that are passed by Congress.

If this should be done, it may be that the Congress could then safely delegate to the Secretary of War, or to some other Government agency, the right to authorize the construction of bridges, so that it would no longer be necessary to take up the time of the House and the Senate with the consideration of individual bridge bills.

It may also be possible to pass general legislation providing for the amortization of the cost of privately owned toll bridges, and the payment to their owners of reasonable interest and legitimate profit, and thereafter for their automatic reversion to the public; certainly if such legislation can be passed that would not discourage or prevent the investment of private capital in such structures, it would seem to be very desirable.

These questions will no doubt receive the earnest consideration of Congress during its next regular sessions.

BUSINESS AFTER THE RECESS

Mr. DENISON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. When the House convenes in September and meets twice a week, will it be proper to transact any kind of business?

The SPEAKER. No; there can be no general legislation.

Mr. DENISON. Will it be proper to introduce bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks bills can be introduced.

Mr. GARNER. You can put the bills in the basket, of course.

TOURIST PASSPORT SYSTEM

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, for many years before the war travel between civilized countries was as free as between our States.

Only Czarist Russia and Turkey under the Sultan's rule clung to the old custom of making the visitor from abroad account for himself upon every crossing of their frontiers or whenever he took a railroad train.

Along with many other bad things the world conflict brought with it a revival of this ancient restriction upon free intercourse between nations.

Perhaps it was unavoidable then.

It certainly is avoidable now.

Or, at any rate, if America's limitations upon immigration make it necessary for this country to continue our present hampering requirements upon alien guests who distinctly are not in the immigrant class, at least it should not be continued at their expense.

If we need an object lesson to bring home to us the shortsightedness of the policy we have pursued in the matter of the issuance and validation of passports in postwar years, we have it before us in connection with the recent reciprocal agreement between the United States and France, mutually reducing visa fees from a $10 to a $2 rate.

It is a reduction which will cost France in the neighborhood of $2,000,000 annually, as compared with about a $100,000 loss to Uncle Sam, because American tourists bound for France are many, while French tourists bound for America are few.

Nevertheless the advantage is with the French. Why?

Because she wants American tourists. They are profitable. She is intelligent enough to see the folly of throwing obstacles in their way.

The French tourist visiting the United States doubtless spends far less with us than the American tourist in France. We can hardly make him a source of much revenue, as the American tourist is to the French.

Still, we want him to come.

An exchange of tourists makes for better international acquaintanceships, for friendship, for the promotion of trade.

Even the $2 fee should be abolished. The United States, under authority of an act of Congress of February 25, 1925, has offered to conclude agreements with all countries for the reduction or abolishment of nonimmigrant visa fees.

In justice to European governments—and decidedly to the discredit of our own claims to exceptional business good sense—it must be admitted that the United States originally was responsible for the imposition of exorbitant passport and visa fees. We took the initiative, and Europe naturally retaliated in kind.

The advanced charge never was a worth-while source of revenue to us. It was on the other side of the Atlantic.

However, Europe was not blind to the fact that it cost more than it yielded in the end. Belgium, Denmark, Esthonia, Finland, Germany, Holland, Italy, Sweden, and Switzerland, one after another, dropped all charges. Other countries reduced theirs to a nominal minimum. Now France.

Great Britain stands out against a reduction.

In her case the $10 visa charge is not the only difficulty. The British find fault also with our head tax of $8, which we levy upon each alien landing upon our soil.

Immigration, she argues, all comes our way.

Her money pays our head tax. She takes in none of ours in return.

It is an annoying tax to her tourists, too. True, his $8 is returned to each tourist who leaves our shores within two months, but not all of them leave quite so soon. Let the visitor overstay his time by a day or a week or a month or so and his payment is forfeited—$8 added to his $10 visa fee.

The burden is not very great, but it is an irritation.

Our $10 charge for his passport, required by each American going abroad, classes with the head tax and the excessive visa fees—not prohibitive, but an unjustifiable nuisance—a discouragement of what ought to be encouraged.

Foreign travel is broadening, enlightening. It makes, in an important degree, for international peace, understanding, and good will.

Why hamper it?

The time is past when only the rich travel.

The student travels, the teacher, the average family.

They travel cheaply. Ten dollars counts appreciably in the total, especially if it comes out of one pocket several times over, for the head of a family group and each one of that group's members as well—to be repeated a number of times over before their return home.

A passport may be a convenience sometimes as a means of identification. As such, perhaps, it is worth a small fee. Ten dollars is extortionate—and a foolish extortion—for the pitiful fund it brings in is less than a bagatelle to the Government.

The passport in this day and generation and in peace time is an anachronism.

It should be abolished.

If unavoidable, it should be free.

If a charge must be made for it, at most it should be nominal.

The immigrant is one proposition. The bona-fide tourist is another and altogether a different proposition—to be encouraged, going and coming, in every reasonable way.

THE FARM RELIEF BILL

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Congress is recessing to-day and we are leaving Washington for several weeks. I feel we are not in position to tell our folks that we have done any very great things for them at this special session. We were called here to help the farmer. We have passed a farm bill which is an improvement over many prior bills, but which, I very much fear, falls far short of what the farmer was promised. To my mind, the help provided in the bill is too indirect, too remote and speculative, and conditioned upon the happening or not happening of too many contingencies. It places the farmer's welfare, as never before, under a bureaucratic control which may help him some, but which I fear will greatly injure him.

The bill has no effective machinery for permanent price elevation. If the farmer gets slightly better prices for a season, I fear a little later his prices will be practically destroyed. As I have repeatedly stated, the bill is not drawn in the interest of the poor man. If it helps prices, it will probably be after the commodity has passed out of the hands of most of the producers. It will be like the physician getting to the sick man after his death. This law does not go to the root of the farmer's trouble. It does not seek to effectively control production and marketing, so as to enable the farmer to name within reasonable limits the price of what he sells. It still leaves the farmer to buy and sell at prices fixed by others, and sets up machinery to loan the farmer more money instead of helping him get a better price so he himself will have money for his own use and to loan.

This bill does not put the farmer on a parity with other industries. It provides for profits to be made out of the farmer instead of enabling him to manage his own affairs and get the full value of his own labor and investment. I sincerely trust we may amend this law from time to time until it is worth while, and if it is found to be a failure we pass at the earliest possible moment a bill which wil grant to the farmer the equality and rights so often promised.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to extend their own remarks in the RECORD on the French debt settlement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days to extend their remarks on the French debt settlement. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have leave to extend their own remarks in the RECORD until the last issue of the RECORD during the recess. The time is usually about 10 days, but Members can ascertain on inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that all Members may extend their remarks up to and including the last day of the publication of the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLOOM. On any subject?

Mr. TILSON. On any subject whatever, but only their own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DECEASED SOLDIERS FROM ILLINOIS BURIED IN PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD a list of the sons of Illinois who have made the supreme sacrifice who are lying in cemeteries in Europe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous consent granted me to extend my remarks for this purpose I present herewith a list prepared by the Quartermaster General of the Army, requested by me, giving the names, organizations, and grave locations of members of the American Expeditionary Forces enlisted from the State of Illinois, whose remains are now interred in cemeteries in Europe.

[1] Ayr Cemetery, Ayr, Scotland.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEECH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing a list of deceased soldiers from Pennsylvania buried in European cemeteries.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think that the Members should have that right and that the office of the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing should have the authority to prevent duplications. We are trying to prevent duplications of these lists from the different States. I ask that one Member from each State have this privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that one Member from each State may have the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a list of the veterans from his particular State who are buried abroad. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DECEASED SOLDIERS FROM OKLAHOMA BURIED IN PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to pay tribute to the part played in the World War by the soldiers of the State of Oklahoma by making a matter of public record the list of the Oklahoma boys who sacrificed their lives on the altar of liberty during that conflict and who now are buried in the cemeteries of Europe.

No State in the Union, Mr. Speaker, played a more notable part in the winning of the World War than did my own State of Oklahoma. In no State did the youth of the land respond to the call to arms more readily, and few Commonwealths suffered as severely in the numbers which made the supreme sacrifice as did that State which I have the honor to represent in part.

It was my privilege to have served in the A. E. F., and many of the men included in the list below were personally known and dear to me. Only two years ago, while upon a visit to Europe, upon the occasion of the convention of the American Legion, I visited many of the graves of my former comrades. These graves constitute a lasting tie between this Nation and those nations associated with us in the late war. They will be forever shrines to be visited by patriotic Americans who will desire to pay tribute to the memory of those to whom they are destined to be lastingly indebted. Through this medium it is my purpose to acquaint the people of my State with the exact location of each of these Oklahoma graves, whether in France, Belgium, or England, in order that the present and future generations may more easily visit them through this—Oklahoma's roll of honor:

POPULATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in an interview last fall I said the people generally were tired of immigration and would suspend it all if they could. Later, in a debate at the annual meeting of the National Chamber of Commerce, I amplified the statement. Indorsement has been general. However, the best-informed and most ardent restrictionists see the difficulties and the dangers of complete suspension.

My proposal limited immigration to the fathers, mothers, wives, and children of those now here. But in attempting to write such a law one would have to pay attention to the clauses of our treaties with the nations of the world; to the demand for the admission of certain highly skilled technicians and experts; the admission of learned professors; of world-famed artists, musicians, and members of the professions, including the "pseudos" of all these. Once the naming of exemptions begins the trouble starts.

RESTRICTION OF MEXICAN IMMIGRATION NEXT

But the demand for more exclusion and better selection persists and will not down. More than one-half of the Senators and more than two-thirds of the Members of the House of Representatives favor still sharper restriction than we now have. The demand for restriction of immigration from Mexico is so insistent that all that seems to remain is the writing of a workable bill. Congress will pass any reasonable act, but the measure will meet much opposition, nevertheless, which will cause every possible delay.

Among the comments coming to me were several from Alaska, a Territory one-fifth as large as the United States, with a population of not to exceed 50,000—one-half white and one-half Indian. One editor in Alaska says:

It is true that immigration has made America great. Foreign streams have borne well their part in the country's industrial progress. They have put their impress upon agriculture, upon forest resources, fisheries, and mines. They have helped in a big way to build railroads and cities. All that and more can be credited to immigration. Yet many are coming to the point of view expressed with courage and frankness by the Washington Congressman to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. They are thinking that even good things can be carried to excess. They believe that the hour has struck for sharper restriction and a long period of assimilation of the foreign elements now in the country. To these Congressman JOHNSON's advanced declaration will be a call to action.

This Alaskan editor is farsighted. Most Alaskans desire the immediate peopling of Alaska, regardless of the fact that Federal laws do not invite capital to go there to invest, prospect, and provide pay rolls so that population can exist when it arrives. Much of Canada is in the same predicament, although that Dominion is opening its interior and northern portions rapidly to make ready for the population that is certain to arrive—much of it from the United States—before 30 more years have rolled by.

One-half of Alaska is as habitable as Norway. It could sustain a population of 10,000,000, and will in the course of time. But before Alaska has even 1,000,000 people Canada will have 40,000,000. Both places are in reserve for the oncoming millions and should be held, as far as reasonably possible, for the posterity of North America. Ninety-eight per cent of Alaska is public domain.

HOW POPULATION INCREASES

The United States had but 5,000,000 population in 1800, and Europe but 150,000,000. What will be the population in the year 2000, or 70 years from now? Few of us realize the steady advance year by year of the world's population. War, plague, and famine no longer strike down in such numbers as Malthus calculated. Yet, in our day, we have had the World War, and with it 8,543,515 deaths, to say nothing of the loss of production through absence, widowhood, excess of women, and the great numbers of men maimed and wrecked on the field but still in the hospitals or on the disability rolls. But we offset these latter-day destructions by providing for the survival of the unfittest through science, medicine, and sanitation, as a British author says gloomily. (C. W. Armstrong's Survival of the Unfittest, London, Daniel, 1927.)

Also, we have in China now a famine as fearful as any known in the history of the world. Best estimates are that 40,000,000 are starving in that country of ancient civilization and new government. Some Chinese officials in Washington think the number without food is more than 40,000,000. People are actually dying there by the hundreds of thousands; and yet, how few of our own 123,000,000 people can stop on our own mad dash from the cradle to the grave—most of us traveling that road at 90 miles an hour—to think of the death by starvation of one or two million Chinese?

And if we do stop to think we realize that our surplus wheat, if sent to them, would really reach the various armies there and not the famine stricken.

We might reflect that most of the 3,200,000 people of India live on 6 or 8 cents a day, and that religious customs there encourage many forms of death; and that great Russia, which once had 180,000,000, has lost 30,000,000 by war, famine, revolution, and migration, and that most of those remaining are in distress.

MERE POPULATION DOES NOT MEAN PROSPERITY

After reflecting on the plights of these three countries with the largest populations—China, India, and Russia—we find that the United States is the fourth country of the world in population. We like to brag about our population. Cities, counties, and States are measured by numbers of inhabitants. Some day it may strike us that mere population does not mean prosperity or happiness or safety of government.

Some writers like to say that Texas could hold 30,000,000 people, California 20,000,000, Alaska 8,000,000, and so on. Of course, they can and will in four or five generations.

It is well to remember that the British Isles in a hundred years have sent millions to all parts of the world (mostly the New World) to increase and multiply, and Britain has not lost population at home; that Italy for 50 years has been in the business of exporting people and still is increasing in population at home.

THE ON-COMING GENERATIONS

Some day we may figure out that citizens of New York ancestry are found in every State and Territory; that New York's present 10,000,000 furnish as many persons to fill up the other States as Czechoslovakia's 13,000,000 can furnish; that the 4,600,000 in Texas are just as productive as Scotland's 4,800,000; and that Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio can turn out just as many as Norway, Denmark, and Sweden. Michigan's 3,600,000 are as competent to produce as Finland's 3,500,000. Even California's sons of her native sons can not forever stay at home any more than can Ireland's brave boys. The Irish Free State holds almost 3,000,000, or 134 plus per square mile. California is six times as large as the Free State, but has great arid and mountainous areas.

Our people of mixed ancestry from all the world are wonderful in their virility and their love of the United States, where even the most favored lie awake wondering what they shall do with their children. Those who came from abroad in the last 30 or 50 years know more about the population problem than those of us from more distant European ancestry. The newcomers saw the thing at first hand before they left. They know now that much of the posterity of Greater New York will have to move; that much of it will be pushed out by the pressure of native-born posterity, and not by any more waves of European migration—thanks to the severe but necessary restrictive immigration laws of the United States—which will be more than 200,000,000 before the children born this year have joined the "innumerable throng."

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H. J. Res. 58. Joint resolution to repeal an act approved March 2, 1929, entitled "An act for the relief of C. C. Spiller, deceased," and to provide for the relief of the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 102) entitled "Joint resolution making an appropriation for expenses of participation by the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications to be held at The Hague in September, 1929."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1537) entitled "An act to amend subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled 'An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law,' approved March 4, 1929."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 3671. An act to authorize and direct a survey to be made of the Escambia River and its tributaries, Alabama and Florida;

H. R. 3966. An act to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government;

H. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Kingdom of Iceland to participate in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing and in connection therewith to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericsson;

H. J. Res. 58. Joint resolution to repeal an act approved March 2, 1929, entitled "An act for the relief of C. C. Spiller, deceased," and to provide for the relief of the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased;

H. J. Res. 102. Joint resolution making an appropriation for expenses of participation by the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications to be held at The Hague in September, 1929; and

H. J. Res. 109. Joint resolution authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the International Petroleum Exposition at Tulsa, Okla., to begin October 5, 1929.

The SPEAKER also announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 669. An act to alter and amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific Coast, by the northern route," approved July 2, 1864, and to alter and amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. to issue its bonds for the construction of its road and to secure the same by mortgage, and for other purposes," approved May 31, 1870; to declare forfeited to the United States certain claimed rights asserted by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., or the Northern Pacific Railway Co.; to direct the institution and prosecution of proceedings looking to the adjustment of the grant, and for other purposes;

S. 1535. An act to extend the time for the construction of the bridge across the Chesapeake Bay;

S. 1537. An act to amend subdivision (a) of section 1 of the act entitled "An act making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law," approved March 4, 1929; and

S. 1548. An act extending the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the White River at or near Newport, Ark.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President for his approval bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 3671. An act to authorize and direct a survey to be made of the Escambia River and its tributaries, Alabama and Florida;

H. R. 3966. An act to fix the compensation of officers and employees of the legislative branch of the Government;

H. R. 4016. An act making an appropriation to carry out the provisions of the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929;

H. J. Res. 2. Joint resolution to authorize the President to accept the invitation of the Kingdom of Iceland to participate in the celebration of the one thousandth anniversary of the Althing and in connection therewith to present to the people of Iceland a statue of Leif Ericssen;

H. J. Res. 102. Joint resolution making an appropriation for the expenses of participation of the United States in the meeting of the International Technical Consulting Committee on Radio Communications, to be held at The Hague in September, 1929; and

H. J. Res. 109. Joint resolution authorizing the President to invite the States of the Union and foreign countries to participate in the International Petroleum Exposition at Tulsa, Okla., to begin October 5, 1929.

REPRESENTATIVE WALTER H. NEWTON

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, on June 30 Representative WALTER H. NEWTON will retire from this body after more than 10 years of most faithful and valuable service to become secretary and administrative assistant to the President. During all these years it has been my good fortune to have been associated with him, and with each succeeding year my admiration for him has grown apace.

Almost from the very beginning of his service here Mr. NEWTON has taken a prominent part in the deliberations of the House, and his counsel has frequently been sought by the leaders, of whom he has been one. Mr. NEWTON'S outstanding characteristic is his fearless and unselfish devotion to duty. Often he has stood almost alone, fighting for what he conceived to be right, and he usually has been in the right but not always with the majority.

A number of great men have represented the fifth district of Minnesota, but no one has filled that difficult task with greater satisfaction to that constituency or with greater honor to himself. [Applause.] Mr. NEWTON has been an outstanding Member of this great body. He has helped write and perfect some of the most important measures to be enacted in the past decade. Indeed, he is the author of several very important and beneficial measures.

We who know him for his true worth regret his leaving. We shall miss his sound counsel and his unerring ability to hew to the line on all occasions. I venture the assertion that he will occupy an equally important rôle in his new field of activities. [Applause.] The President is to be congratulated upon securing his services. He will occupy a position of the greatest trust in this administration. The change is not of his seeking. Indeed, he did not wish to leave Congress, but like the good soldier that he is he heeded the call of his President and party leader. Mr. Hoover's gain is our loss, but we may derive satisfaction in having served with him in this body, where he has worked so long and faithfully.

On behalf of his colleagues from Minnesota, for whom I speak. I can sincerely assure him that he will take with him our best wishes for health, happiness, success, long life, and prosperity. We shall sorely miss him as friend and adviser. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep regret that the membership of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce bid farewell to Mr. NEWTON as a member of that committee. He has been one of its most valuable members, always diligent, and with his rare good judgment he has been a tower of strength. I know I express the sentiment of the whole committee when I say that we deeply deplore the fact that he is to leave us to take up new and most important duties.

Personally, I wish to pay this tribute to Mr. NEWTON. We have served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for many years, and I have had a chance to see and recognize his ability and intelligence. As chairman of the committee I owe him a very great debt of gratitude for the active support he has always given me. Mr. NEWTON'S resignation is a personal loss to me, as his wise counsel will be very greatly missed.

The House of Representatives and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce suffer a distinct loss in the resignation of Mr. NEWTON. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it was the intention of my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] to make some remarks concerning the retirement of Mr. NEWTON from the House. Mr. RAYBURN has been unfortunately called from the Chamber. I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of Mr. NEWTON'S retirement from Congress at this particular place in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I express the sentiment of the entire House when I say that I regret the retirement of Hon. WALTER H. NEWTON, of Minnesota, as a member of this body. Mr. NEWTON has served in the House of Representatives for 10 years with great distinction. It has been my privilege and my pleasure to serve with him as a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where questions of great moment have been considered. I have always found him able, fearless, and honest. He will be missed in the House for his wise counsel and his winning personality. He goes from the legislative to a high and responsible position in the executive department of the Government, where I feel sure he will be of great assistance to the President of the United States in carrying the appalling load of responsibility that as President he must carry. We on this side of the House wish him well and wish for him a long life to devote his splendid energies and talents to the service of the people.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, as an associate of Mr. NEWTON for many years in the House, I can testify that he has had the respect and admiration of the House of Representatives. He has rendered valuable service. I think the House of Representatives suffers a distinct loss in his resignation. I say that, representing the minority. He has always been fair and patriotic and we lose a very efficient Member. The executive gains much at the expense of the legislative branch. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, in the resignation of Mr. NEWTON from Congress to become associated with the President, the administrative and executive branch of the Government gains at the expense of the legislative. As he retires from the House Mr. NEWTON is recognized as one its ablest and best Members. [Applause.] The place that he has attained is not the result of mere accident, but of duty well performed. His service of more than 10 years in this body has been characterized by an ability, an industry, a courage, a conscientious attention to duty, and an activity of mind and body, all of an unusual degree. His work, together with his character and personality, has earned for him a position of influence in the House, and has made him one of its outstanding leaders.

As has been so well said by the gentleman from New York, Mr. PARKER, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, those of us who have been more closely associated with him in the work of that committee especially regret to have him leave the House. As a member of the committee Mr. NEWTON has always been attentive to his duties, and has taken an active and leading part in the work of the committee, both in the committee room and on the floor of the House. He is even tempered, and pleasant to work with. We shall miss him here, but we wish him Godspeed in his new field of Government service. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, those preceding me have spoken of WALTER NEWTON'S work here in the House. He has made for himself a most enviable place in the House of Representatives and his loss will be regretted by all those who have associated and worked with him here. He will ever be justly regarded as one of the strong, able, and effective men of his time in the House.

I wish to speak of him in a little different connection, though it is a vital one. I shall speak of his work as a party worker in the political campaigns which are a necessity and the prerequisite to service in this House. I had the pleasure of serving with Mr. NEWTON in a very close and unusual relationship in the campaigns of 1924, 1926, and 1928. In 1924 Mr. Sanders, who was afterwards Secretary to President Coolidge, was placed in charge of the speaker's bureau of the Republican Party in the western half of the country, and I in the eastern territory. Mr. Sanders at once, and very wisely, commandeered WALTER NEWTON as his associate in the Chicago headquarters, and these two made a very strong and effective team.

In 1926 we again formed the same combination in the senatorial and congressional campaigns for that year. Mr. Sanders having gone to the White House, Mr. NEWTON took the speakers' bureau in the western territory and I the East. Again, in 1928, Mr. NEWTON was given charge of the office at Chicago and I again in New York. Let me state that in the relation of associate directors in charge of a speakers' bureau in a heated political campaign there is surely an opportunity for men to become well acquainted with each other. If there are any weak points on either side they are very apt to crop out in such a relationship. It is, therefore, a joy to say that in all those strenuous campaigns I found WALTER NEWTON one of the very best, most diligent, and most effective men to work with that it has ever been my pleasure to be associated with. His fine judgment and his sound political knowledge were of inestimable benefit in the three campaigns I have mentioned.

Last winter it was my privilege to talk with the then President elect, Mr. Hoover, in regard to a man to fill the position to which he later called Mr. NEWTON. I went over with him the entire membership of the House on the Republican side, stating their qualifications as best I could from my knowledge of their work here, and it is not in derogation of anyone else for me to say that I told Mr. Hoover at the time that of all the men in the House whom he could call upon to perform the functions that he had in mind no one in my judgment better fitted than Mr. NEWTON could possibly be found. [Applause.]

I believe that WALTER NEWTON will make for himself a great place in the position to which he is going. [Applause.] It is a new position, without a precedent to hamper or to guide. He has had to sacrifice much in order to take the place, for it is a great sacrifice to give up a place in this House; but I believe in him so strongly and am so much of an optimist regarding him that while I realize that his going is a great loss to Congress it will be such a gain to the executive department that in the end Mr. NEWTON will not regret having made the change. We shall all watch his work with an affectionate interest and expect to be able to rejoice in his great success in that position. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I find that in the endeavor to transact the duties of the position which I shall formally assume on July 1, but which I have already assumed in fact, and at the same time transact my legislative work, it was simply impossible for me to prepare even a brief statement. If therefore you will pardon me I shall speak wholly extemporaneously.

I want to express, in so far as I can express it, my feeling of deep appreciation, not only of the words that have been so kindly spoken here but of the friendship and comradeship that I have enjoyed during the little more than a decade as a Member of this House.

As one believing in our institutions and our form of government and having formed impressions of the functions of the House of Representatives and membership therein long before obtaining membership in it, I always looked upon the House of Representatives as the great deliberative body of the Nation, where the people speak through their Representatives. I have looked upon a Representative as a representative in the sense that Edmund Burke looked upon a representative, as one who is clothed with authority and responsibility, with a constituency believing in him and relying upon him to exercise his own best judgment in legislative matters and willing to come back at stated intervals to answer for the manner in which he performed his duties. I also looked upon a Representative as being not only a representative of a district but of the Nation itself. I formed the most favorable impressions as to the great majority of its membership. And I want to say that during this little over 10 years that that belief in the House, that reliance in its membership and in the patriotism of its Members has not only not been lessened but by reason of this comradeship and this friendship it has been greatly strengthened. [Applause.]

It has been my privilege to represent a district in which I was born and where I have always lived. My people believed in me and expected me to inform myself, keep in touch with them, but to exercise my own judgment providing I was always willing to accept responsibility and to be answerable to them. It may be said that they were patient and long suffering. Representing such a constituency, sitting in this great deliberative and representative body and a member of one of its great committees, I had looked forward to continuing my work here. There is hardly no greater position than to be a Member of this House under those circumstances. In addition to all of this I thoroughly enjoyed my work in the committee room, upon the floor, and especially the comradeship and the good fellowship which has always prevailed here more than in any other place on earth. However, the call came to go elsewhere. After some deliberation it seemed to me that I should accept. The time has come for me to sever this most pleasant relationship. I do so with profound feeling of regret and with a sincere appreciation of your friendship and your comradeship. However, along with this feeling of regret I find compensation in the thought that in accepting this transfer to another field of public service I look forward to seeing you frequently, of retaining that friendship and comradeship, for I hope to be able to promote without reference at all to the middle aisle of this House the heartiest kind of cooperation between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government to the end that those principles of government to which we all subscribe can be carried on. [Applause.]

To the floor leader, the chairman of my committee, and the other good friends who have spoken I am deeply grateful, and Mr. Speaker, in closing my remarks in this body, may I not express to you my deep appreciation of the courtesy that has always been extended to me both by yourself and your predecessor. [Applause, the Members rising.]

REVIEW OF THE WORK OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he has any further business to transact to-day?

Mr. TILSON. I know of nothing else in the way of business to transact unless the gentleman has some request to make.

Mr. GARNER. None whatever.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, we are about to separate temporarily while our friends at the other end of the Capitol, first in the Finance Committee and later in the Senate itself, perform their function upon one of the bills the House has already passed. Before we go it is well to pause for a moment to take stock of what we have thus far accomplished in the House. I begin by saying without fear of successful contradiction that neither branch of Congress in any session of any Congress in our history ever more promptly, thoroughly, or more in the public interest completed the work for which Congress came together, than has the House of Representatives in the present session. It has been in the best sense of the word a successful session.

On April 15 Congress met in extraordinary session. On the following day a message from the President was read, in which the purposes for which the session was called were outlined. They included only a bill for the relief of agriculture, a revision of the tariff, the passage of the census and reapportionment bill, and the repeal or further extension of the time in which the national-origins provision of the immigration law should go into effect.

A bill for the relief of agriculture was promptly reported, considered, and passed by the House. In the Senate quite a different bill was finally passed, including the so-called debenture plan. In the conferences between the two Houses, however, the bill was finally restored to substantially the same measure that originally passed the House, and in this form it has become a law.

After the farm bill had passed the House a tariff bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee, was considered in the House for three weeks, and passed by a very large vote. This bill went to the Senate and is there receiving the attention of the Finance Committee, which will probably require several weeks before the bill is ready for consideration on the floor of the Senate.

While the House was engaged in passing the farm relief and tariff bills the Senate acted upon a census and reapportionment bill. This was promptly passed by the House, and having passed through the conference stage between the two Houses, went to the President and has received his approval.

The national-origins provision was taken up in the proper committee of the Senate but failed to receive a favorable report. Later it was brought to a record vote in the Senate on a motion to discharge the committee, but the vote was again adverse. The result in the Senate made it futile to take any action whatever in the House.

The farm bill as finally enacted into law is the embodiment in statute form of the promises and pledges of the Republican platform and of the presidential candidate elected upon that platform. It places agriculture in a favored position so far as it is possible and economically sound for legislation to do so. It is hoped and believed that agriculture will be greatly encouraged and benefited by its operation.

The enactment of an apportionment law that will forever hereafter prevent a failure to reapportion under the Constitution is of itself a great achievement. For almost a decade Congress has failed to perform this plain constitutional duty, and there were the strongest reasons for fearing that, unless an anticipatory reapportionment law was passed before the 1930 census is taken, no reapportionment would be made for years to come, and never again without greatly increasing the size of the House. With this law on the statute books if a future Congress charged with the duty of making a reapportionment shall fail in that duty the law we have enacted will automatically come into operation and the apportionment will be made in accordance with this law.

If we may judge from the limited amount, as well as the source and character of the criticism both in the House and in the press of the country directed against the tariff bill, it must be by far the best bill ever written in the history of modern tariff making. There was never in this House a tariff bill, the attack upon which was so feeble as that directed against the present bill, and the press of the country, much of it attacking in glittering generalities, has on the whole been far less critical of the rate structures than in the case of any tariff bill within my memory. The fact is that with the exception of certain notable increases in rates on certain agricultural products, which were anticipated and for the most part can be justified, the increases in rates have been limited, moderate, and with but few exceptions can be fully justified by changes in competitive conditions. In all the outcry against the bill little has been or can be said against the comparatively slight increases in the textile, chemical, metals, and sundries schedules, which together include a very large proportion of all the items contained in the bill.

Not over 15 per cent of the items in the present tariff law have been changed at all, and of these in many cases only a fraction of the total is changed, so that no one who agrees that the tariff law now in effect is good can at the same time claim that the pending bill is bad. It is, in fact, an excellent bill, made up of the present satisfactory law and such limited changes as can be readily justified by changed conditions. If, with minor modifications, it may promptly become a law, it will soon demonstrate that the Republican protective-tariff policy is still the best policy, and we shall see the country continue to thrive and prosper under it in the future as at present and in the recent past, when a very similar tariff bill constructed upon the same principles has been the law of the land.

I repeat that I regard the present session thus far as having been distinctly a successful one from the standpoint of the House. We have functioned, we have done our work, we have done it thoroughly and completely. [Applause.] As we now go from here for a brief period, I wish you all a very delightful, restful vacation. I further hope that whenever we may come back you may return in fine health, ready for the work that will then be ahead of us.

I wish to thank my friend the gentleman from Texas, the new minority leader, for his cooperation, for that is what it has meant, during the weeks we have been together. When Finis Garrett left that post I wondered whether there could ever be another minority leader with whom I could get along so well in the transaction of the public business. I am glad to say that I have found the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] ready to meet me in the same spirit as did Mr. Garrett. I wish to publicly thank him and those on his side of the Chamber for their helpful cooperation. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, very naturally one would like to felicitate the country on the action of the Congress. I wish I could do this. I regret, however, to be compelled to say that the work that has been accomplished is not, in my opinion, beneficial to the country.

There are only two pieces of legislation that have reached completion, as I understand, as recommended by the President. One of them is what is known as the farm bill, and while I have never expressed myself concerning that piece of legislation, I will take the time now to say, briefly, that I do not believe it is going to come up to the expectations of those who passed it or those for whose benefit it is intended. I think it is only a step in the direction of a final solution of the farm problem. It is an experiment and I voted for it upon that theory. I think in the next decade, as it continually becomes a political football in this country, something beneficial for the farmer may come out of it.

The only other piece of legislation you have put upon the statute books that the President suggested is the census and apportionment bill. In this legislation, of course, you violated all precedents in this country. You took away from the Congress its obligated power to apportion the country and landed this power in the executive branch of the Government.

The only other legislation considered is half-way done, and that is the tariff. In this piece of legislation you also sacrificed the constitutional rights of the Congress of the United States to levy and assess taxes. In addition to this, you took away from the citizens the right to go to the courts.

If you think this is a record you can be proud of, I am willing for you to go to the country on that record. [Laughter and applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

CONRAD WEISER MEMORIAL, BERKS COUNTY, PA.

Mr. ESTERLY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the bill H. R. 3656, which I recently introduced in the House, authorizing an appropriation of $5,000 for the erection of a tablet or marker at Weiser Park, Berks County, Pa., to commemorate the services of Conrad Weiser to the United States of America, I desire to mention that Col. Conrad Weiser was born in Germany in 1696, emigrating to America in 1710 with his father and other Palatines, spending three years on Livingston Manor, N. Y.

Father and son passed the winter of 1713 with a Mohawk chief in Schenectady, N. Y., and in the spring they went to the Schoharie Valley, where they suffered great hardships.

When Weiser was 17 years of age he went to live for eight months with Inagnant, a prominent Mohawk chief, again enduring many hardships. The greater part of the next 15 years of his life were spent living among the Indians, learning their language and customs. This experience prepared him for his great work as colonial interpreter and diplomat.

In 1729 Weiser arrived in Berks County, Pa., and in 1730 erected at Womelsdorf a stone house, which still stands and is viewed by every visitor to this historic town. His land totaled 1,000 acres, and 39 acres of this is now a State park, and a United States post office was established there by Congressman ESTERLY in 1926 and named Weiser Park.

The French and Indian wars may be said to start from 1732. The colonies under England occupied the narrow coastal fringe east of the Alleghenies. Westward a continuous line of French forts stretched from the Gulf of Mexico to Canada. The French had a vision some day to control not only the western portion but to also be masters of the English colonies. Secretly the French were planning to enlist the support of the Indians. It was generally understood that whichever side should gain the support of the Indians as an ally would be victorious.

Through Weiser the colonial policy of the Penns was shaped to counteract the French influence with the Indian tribes. The Delaware and Shawnee Indians sided with the French and the Six Nations through Weiser's efforts became the ally of the Colonies.

Braddock's defeat in July, 1755, against Fort Duquesne is but one picture of the French and Indian War. The marauding and scalping parties is a tale of misery and sorrow which followed this ill-fated expedition.

The present great United States is indebted to the efforts of Colonel Weiser for his vigorous and diplomatic efforts in preventing the hostile Delaware Indians from penetrating beyond the Blue Mountains in Pennsylvania, and his persuasion in having the colonial governor erect forts in these mountains, which were then the outposts of the settlements.

Had the French and their Indian allies succeeded in penetrating this line of defense there is no question that they would have advanced to the Atlantic and taken possession of the seacoast towns. There would then have been no Declaration of Independence and this country would still, no doubt, be a colonial possession of France.

The French and Indian War ended in 1759, but due to the strong fortification planned by Weiser, hostilities ceased in Pennsylvania in 1757. Weiser's Indian conferences during this period cover a vast territory:

Weiser helped to lay out Penn's new town on the upper Schuylkill, Reading, in 1748, where he acquired considerable property and established a second home and entered into business by building the first store at what is now Fifth and Penn Streets, where Stichter's hardware store is now located. It was called the "White Store," and here Weiser traded with the Indians and the settlers.

He also was instrumental in having Berks County created in March, 1752, it being taken out of parts of Lancaster, Chester, and Philadelphia Counties. Weiser served as the first judge of Berks County.

Conrad Weiser died July 13, 1760, at his country home in Weiser Park, where he and his family are buried. A descendant of Weiser, the Hon. Frederick Augustus Conrad Muhlenberg, was the first Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States. He was also elected in 1787 a delegate to the Pennsylvania State Convention, which considered the adoption of the United States Constitution. He was made president of this body, and when the vote was a tie for and against adoption, he cast the deciding vote in favor of its ratification and thus saved the Federal Union, which hung upon the vote of Pennsylvania.

Many pilgrimages have been made to Weiser's tomb. The most distinguished visitor was Gen. George Washington, who while serving as the first President of the United States, accompanied by national figures of that time—Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution; David Rittenhouse, astronomer and scientist; William Smith, the provost of the University of Pennsylvania; and Tench Francis, the land agent of the Penn's estate—was escorted to the tomb by Gen. (afterwards Gov.) Joseph Hiester and party, of Reading, on the morning of November 14, 1793, after spending the night at Selzer's Hotel in Womelsdorf, about half a mile from the grave.

General Washington, standing at the grave in reverent attitude, uttered the words which give Col. Conrad Weiser his place in the hall of fame: "Posterity can not forget his services."

The present Governor of Pennsylvania, John S. Fisher, has commented on Col. Conrad Weiser as follows:

> Undoubtedly the work of Colonel Weiser was of national import and had much to do with directing the course of events in the early Colonial period. His efforts were potent features in bringing our country under Anglo-Saxon rather than French influence.

It is for this reason the residents of the fourteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania desire to perpetuate the memory of this great diplomat.

DEMOCRATIC HARMONY DINNER

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, recently our Democratic friends gathered in Washington at a "harmony dinner" in honor of the Hon. Jouett Shouse.

At this gathering the dove of peace was substituted for the traditional animal symbolic of the great minority party. In the spirit of mutual helpfulness, and so that certain impressions of this gathering may be preserved in the records of the Nation for the guidance of our friends on the other side of the aisle, may I submit the following editorial from the Washington Daily News:

The Democrats have had their harmony meeting in Washington. Many of the anti-Smith faction stayed away; but, everything considered, the gathering was harmonious enough.

There was much talk of the future, pulling together for victory, and that kind of thing.

Raskob, whose record as a financial genius is somewhat better than his record as a campaign manager, was there to explain how they could wipe out their deficit and get up another campaign chest.

Shouse, the new chief of the executive committee, was there to assure them that national headquarters would not be grinding axes for any particular candidate, but work in nonpartisan fashion to perfect a better nation-wide party organization.

But more important than what was said was that left unsaid.

The name of Alfred E. Smith was not mentioned.

There was no reference to prohibition.

Are the party leaders now afraid or ashamed to mention the name of the man who eight short months ago polled the largest popular vote ever received by a Democratic candidate for office in the United States?

Are the party leaders afraid to mention the most discussed issue in America to-day—prohibition?

But quite apart from these two specific cases of Democratic timidity, has it not occurred to those hard-headed politicians that there is something even more necessary for a minority party than funds and organization? A majority party can win with funds and organization.

But any second party which unseats the Republicans, who have ruled the country with only two interruptions since the Civil War, must have an issue. That is rather axiomatic in politics.

If the harmony-seeking Democrats have any issue up their sleeves, they are certainly keeping their secret well.

PHILIPPINE PRODUCTS AND THE TARIFF

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include my statement before the tariff subcommittee No. 1 of the United States Senate on June 18, 1929.

The statement follows:

TARIFF SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1 OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is a Philippine delegation in Washington to-day whose members together with the two Resident Commissioners from the Philippines are charged with the duty of cooperating with the officials of the American Government in the hope that a just, righteous, and final settlement of American-Filipino relations may be reached. As a Resident Commissioner I appear before you in representation of the delegation and of the government and people of the Philippine Islands. In their name and in mine I wish at the outset to thank you for your courtesy.

If it pleases the members of this body, I shall make a brief presentation of a few pertinent facts after which you may ask any question you desire. If anyone prefers to ask questions in the course of my remarks I will adjust myself to your wishes.

The problem before us is the tariff question with special reference to Schedule 1—chemicals, oils, and paints. All the important products of the Philippines are affected. Proposals have been made to place a limit on Philippine exports to this country, especially sugar. When the schedule on sugar and molasses will come up for discussion we hope to present our views on the subject as we also hope so to do with respect to the special and administrative provisions when discussion of them will be in order before the Senate Committee on Finance. With respect to Philippine coconut oil and copra, which is the specific problem now before us, the agitation of vested interests apparently not so much concerned with the welfare of the people of the Philippines, including Americans resident there and not concerned with the ethical principle involved in the relations between the two peoples is "for a full tariff duty against the Philippine Islands."

ANNOUNCED AMERICAN-PHILIPPINE POLICY

The advocates of levying "full tariff rates on both copra and coconut oil" from the Philippine Islands claim that they are "backed by the precedents of former tariff acts sustaining this principle of levying a tariff against them" (the Philippine people). The question is, What has been the principle sustained by America in her tariff relations with the Philippines?

In the statement of Mr. Henry L. Stimson, former Governor General of the Philippines, now the Secretary of State, before the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives on the 17th of April, 1929, he used these words:

"This original movement initiated under the McKinley and Roosevelt administrations 30 years ago was based upon free trade between the Philippines and the United States."

We have thus the testimony of a high, responsible official of this administration saying that America's trade policy with the Philippine people was based upon the principle of free trade, whereas the opponents of Philippine welfare claim that it was the "principle of levying a tariff against them." The choice is easy.

In 1905 the Republican majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means enunciated the free trade principle clearly in these words: "The only logical result from our possession of the Philippine Islands is free trade between the islands and the rest of the United States. It is definitely settled that we retain them until the people are prepared for self-government." The minority members of that same committee were also in favor of free trade.

In 1909 a Republican Congress granted a very large measure of free trade when it was permitted by Article IV of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain which provided as follows:

"The United States will, for the term of 10 years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States."

In 1913 a Democratic Congress granted substantially complete free trade when the following provisions were approved:

"C. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials the growth or product of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per centum of their total value, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty: Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty: And provided further, That the free admission herein provided of such articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, into the Philippine Islands, or of the growth, product, or manufacture, as hereinbefore defined, of the Philippine Islands into the United States, shall be conditioned upon the direct shipment thereof, under a through bill of lading, from the country of origin to the country of destination: Provided, That direct shipment shall include shipments in bond through foreign territory contiguous to the United States: Provided, however, That if such articles become unpacked while en route by accident, wreck, or other casualty, or so damaged as to necessitate their repacking, the same shall be admitted free of duty upon satisfactory proof that the unpacking occurred through accident or necessity and that the merchandise involved is the identical merchandise originally shipped from the United States or the Philippine Islands, as the case may be, and that its condition has not been changed except for such damage as may have been sustained: And provided, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in the United States, upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles, goods, wares, or merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps, to be provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and to be affixed in such manner and under such regulations as he, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and such articles, goods, wares, or merchandise, shipped from said islands to the United States shall be exempt from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal revenue laws of the Philippine Islands: And provided further, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid in the Philippine Islands, upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise going into the Philippine Islands from the United States, a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the Philippine Islands upon the like articles, goods, wares, or merchandise of Philippine Islands manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamps or otherwise, as provided by the laws in the Philippine Islands; and such articles, goods, wares, or merchandise going into the Philippine Islands from the United States shall be exempt from the payment of any tax imposed by the internal revenue laws of the United States: And provided further, That in addition to the customs taxes imposed in the Philippine Islands, there shall be levied, collected, and paid therein upon articles, goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the Philippine Islands from countries other than the United States, the internal-revenue tax imposed by the Philippine government on like articles manufactured and consumed in the Philippine Islands or shipped thereto for consumption therein, from the United States: And provided further, That from and after the passage of this act all internal revenues collected in or for account of the Philippine Islands shall accrue intact to the general government thereof and be paid into the insular treasury: And provided further, That section 13 of 'An act to raise revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909, is hereby repealed."

In 1922 another Congress reenacted the same provisions of the tariff act of 1913. It is therefore clear as clear can be that the American policy in the enactment of tariff acts has not been governed by the principle of levying duties against Philippine products but by the principle of reciprocal free trade arrangement between the two countries.

If our adversaries, the proponents of America's reversing her avowed Philippine economic policy, are bent on splitting hairs with respect to the tariff provisions governing the trade relations between America and the Philippines, let it be my turn to indulge in a critical analysis of the following pertinent provisions of the tariff act of 1922, Title III, special provisions:

"SEC. 201. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands the rates of duty which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles imported from foreign countries: Provided, That all articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials the growth or product of the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per centum of their total value, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands, shall hereafter be admitted free of duty: Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty: * * *"

I contend that a careful analysis of the foregoing provisions demonstrate that under the present trade arrangement the decided advantage is on the side of the United States. Why? Because all American exports of every kind and description are admitted absolutely without duty into the Philippines. Not so with Philippine exports coming to the United States, because exception is made of Philippine articles which contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent of their total value. You will please notice that no such exception or qualification or limitation or prohibition is made upon American articles sent to the Philippines.

HOUSE ACTION

The tariff bill pending action in the Senate has already been acted upon by the House of Representatives. In the official report of the Committee on Ways and Means on H. R. 2667 it was stated that the members rejected "all amendments proposing to restrict in any way imports from the possessions of the United States by imposing limits as to kind, quality, values, or in any other way * * *." The House subsequently sanctioned this recommendation, thus reasserting the principle of free trade between the two peoples under the protection of the same flag.

OUR PLEA

Our plea now is that this principle, which has governed previous Congresses in tariff enactments, shall be respected and maintained by the present Senate, at least while the Philippine Islands remain as insular possessions of the United States.

ADDITIONAL FACTS AND CORRECTION OF EXAGGERATED CLAIMS

I am aware that the voluminous record of hearings conducted by the House Committee on Ways and Means contains a great deal of facts, figures, data, and information which are helpful. We are thus all relieved of the necessity of dealing with such matters, and it would be unpardonable on my part to indulge at length in unnecessary duplication. I must say, however, that there are a few pertinent facts lacking and some misstatements and wild claims which need rectifying, and I purpose to supply a few such facts and rectify certain glaring errors, not to say gross misrepresentations.

ALLEGED MENACE

In the discussion of Philippine sugar and Philippine coconut production the advocates of limitation and the champions of levying duties upon them have made much of the allegation that the Philippines is a menace. In the case of sugar the agitation has subsided when it became generally known that Philippine sugar exported to the United States forms but an infinitesimal portion—only 8 per cent—of the total sugar consumption in this country. In the case of coconut and its derivatives, those who were so anxious in depicting the menace from the Philippines resorted to exaggeration of the most elemental facts. Here is a sample taken from Volume I of the hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, page 613: "The total area of the (Philippine) islands is given at 700,685 square miles, or approximately 448,000,000 acres."

I know, of course, that such tactics are doomed to failure because intelligent Americans know that the area where coconut may be grown in the islands can never be as large as these figures may lead one to believe, because the true area of the islands is not 700,685 square miles but only 114,400 square miles; not 448,000,000 acres but only 73,215,766 acres. I have already shown the equally fallacious deduction made by the same people that the former tariff acts "sustain the principle of levying a tariff against" the Philippines. (Hearings before the House Committee on Ways and Means, Vol. I, p. 616.)

ANOTHER CLAIM FALSE AND UNSEEMLY

Those who would place limitation or levy duties on Philippine products in their fond endeavor to give plausibility to their claims have sought to appeal to prejudice by alleging that foreigners are the chief beneficiaries in the Philippines under the present trade arrangement. This is not true either in the sugar industry or in the coconut industry. In the former, Filipinos and Americans are in control, and in the latter Americans and Filipinos are in control from the standpoint of land ownership, capital investment, or labor.

But granting, for the sake of argument, but for this only, that foreigners are the beneficiaries, I think Americans ought to be the last of all peoples to raise a hulla-baloo about foreign investments; because, if it is an offense to secure benefits from foreign investments, then the American people would be the worst offenders. America has been pouring abroad about $2,000,000,000 annually in the form of investments since 1923. "* * * A sum in the neighborhood of $15,000,000,000 appears to be the accepted aggregate of American investment abroad. This is exclusive, of course, of governmental advances to other nations." Americans by the end of 1927 had the following foreign investments by geographical groups: In Europe, $4,327,000,000; Canada, $3,922,000,000; Central America, $2,915,000,000; South America, $2,247,000,000; China, Japan, and Philippines, $727,000,000; in Australia, Africa, etc., $362,000,000. (G. W. Edwards, American Dollars Abroad, pp. 5–6.)

COCONUT AND COTTON INDUSTRY

In the Philippines we grow tropical products. In America you grow temperate products. The products of both countries supplement and complement one another. We have great demand for your agricultural and industrial products. You have need of our products. Herein is a basis for good international trade and I do wish we all could calmly and in a sensible manner look at the situation aright.

From what districts of the United States comes the strongest opposition to the Philippine coconut oil and copra industry? From the cotton and dairy districts. Let me say to the cotton growers that the inhabitants of my country are now about your best customers. Among our principal imports from the United States cotton manufactures hold first rank. Every man in my country is spending annually 2 pesos for your cotton products. Every man, every woman, every child, spends $1. Business foresight and far-sightedness dictate that you help increase our purchasing power in order that we may consume more of your cotton products. You are anxious to help agriculture and farmers. That is why a special session of Congress has been called. You are not accomplishing this by crushing our industries. We are now spending about 25,000,000 pesos yearly for American cotton goods. We are also good customers of yours for your meat and dairy products. In 1927 we bought six million and a half pesos of your meat and dairy products, including cheese, butter, and milk. This demand will increase with the march of the years. It is not for the good of American agriculture to take steps that will reduce the purchasing power of a people from a country where you almost have a monopoly of the market. To do so would be in the long run a sort of hara-kiri for the cotton and meat and dairy industry.

You object to our coconut oil because of your cottonseed oil. America uses practically all the cottonseed oil produced here. Cottonseed oil is a by-product. America needs more coconut oil than we can supply now.

There are only seven coconut-oil mills operating in the Philippines now. There used to be more. Factories sprang up like mushrooms during the World War period. As many as 43 companies were at one time in existence. With the period of depression as an aftermath of the war, the companies became bankrupt or disappeared, and to-day only seven survived. The monthly capacity of all mills was about 18,000 to 20,000 tons of oil. The present monthly output has dwindled down to 16,000 tons. Some 1,600 people are employed. The total investment, including working capital, is $17,500,000. The average extraction by Philippine mills is between 62 per cent and 63 per cent. The dominating nationality in the coconut-oil idustry is American. Are the Americans in the Philippines less entitled to consideration than the Americans on the continent?

FREE-TRADE ARRANGEMENT BENEFICIAL TO AMERICANS

That the Filipinos have been benefited by the reciprocal trade arrangement which has been in vogue between the United States and Philippines for several years is admitted. That Americans likewise have been greatly benefited can not be denied.

There is no blinking the fact that America reaped incalculable benefits from such trade relations. The direct business benefits are obvious and need not be pointed out. The indirect benefits are even greater. American trade in the Orient grew by leaps and bounds since the occupation of the Philippines. Twenty-five or thirty years ago America's import and export trade in Asia and Australasia was comparatively negligible. During the 15-year period from 1913 to 1927, inclusive, your trade registered an increase of $2,159,000,000. And never forget you have your greatest future opportunity for business expansion in the Orient. Your potential customers are not counted by the thousands or millions. They number 1,000,000,000.

RÔLE OF OUR TRADE RELATIONS

How have you as a nation progressed as you have in securing your business footing in the Far East? By the policy of altruism which you announced to be followed in the administration of Philippine affairs. How have you succeeded to enhance your far-eastern trade and commerce? By fostering good will and understanding. How may you capture your potential customers? By being true to your plighted words and by fostering friendship.

What America does in the Philippines is the basis of interpretation of America's motives and principles by the peoples in the Pacific borders. The Philippines acts as America's broadcasting station. Win the friendship and confidence of peoples there to insure your economic, moral, and political prestige. The oriental buys more because of friendship rather than by the simple merit of the article. This may appear peculiar to an occidental, but it is true. It is fundamental. Lose his friendship, shake his confidence, and the doubt and confusion that ensue will blind him to the worth of your goods. It is therefore a business and a moral asset for America to see to it that nothing that she does or omits to do in her dealings with the only Christian nation in the Far East now or in the future which will result in shaking the faith and confidence or lessening the friendship of the peoples in the Orient.

Some who have appeared at these congressional hearings and others who have spoken or written about the tariff, have contended that America, in the prosecution of her policy of protection, ought to place the Philippines in the category of an independent foreign country. Here, indeed, lies the anomaly of our situation. The uncertainty of our status has once again been accentuated. For certain purposes the Philippines is considered domestic; for other purposes it is considered foreign. It does not seem just, fair, and logical that our country should, while a dependency, be treated as an independent country for tariff purposes. Interpreting the sentiment of my people and the Philippine Legislature, and on my own responsibility, I say you must first make the Philippines a free and independent republic before you treat my country as an independency for economic purposes.

Some who have appeared have stressed the point that America has the legal power to impose a tariff duty upon Philippine products and, having this legal power, you ought to exercise it. There is no disposition on the part of my people—certainly there is none on my part—to question the legal right of America to do this. The very organic act under which the Philippines is governed, section 10, clearly states that "the trade relations between the islands and the United States shall continue to be governed exclusively by laws of the Congress of the United States." We do not question that you have the legal power to dictate the economic policy that should be pursued in your dealings with the millions of souls in the Philippines. But I wish to invoke a principle; I wish to invoke precedents; I wish to invoke contemporary American political history.

Your present Secretary of State said that "the attempt to restrict freedom of trade between the islands and the United States represents about the worst possible backward step that could be taken in American policy."

Coolidge stated to an envoy sent by the government of the Philippines:

"You may be very sure that the American people have never entertained the purpose of exploiting the Filipino people or their country."

Harding gave this assurance to a Philippine mission:

"No backward step is contemplated; no diminution of your domestic control is to be sought."

Wilson announced:

"We are not owners of the Philippine Islands. We hold them in trust for the people who live in them. They are theirs for the uses of their life. We are not even their partners. It is our duty as trustees to make whatever arrangement of government will be most serviceable to their freedom and development."

Taft boldly asserted the following:

"From the beginning to the end of the state papers which were circulated in these islands as authoritative expressions of the Executive, the motto that 'the Philippines are for the Filipinos' and that the Government of the United States is here for the purpose of preserving 'Philippines for the Filipinos' for their benefit, for their elevation, for their civilization, again and again and again appear."

Roosevelt declared:

"We are endeavoring to develop the natives themselves so that they shall take an ever-increasing share in their own government, and as far as is prudent we are already admitting their representatives to a governmental equality with our own."

McKinley announced to the world thus:

"The Philippines are ours, not to exploit, but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government. This is the path of duty which we must follow or be recreant to a mighty trust committed to us."

Congress itself is committed to the policy that "all properties and rights secured by the United States from Spain are placed under the control of said islands for the benefit of the inhabitants thereof."

In the light of the pronouncements which to us are sacred, I ask: Do you have the moral right? Is it ethically just that America, rich and powerful, should send all her products free of duty and without limit to my country and levy duties upon some and place limitation upon others of the products of the Philippines, relatively poor and weak?

American sense of honor is at stake. American justice is on the balance. America, indeed, is on trial. She is on trial before herself. She is on trial before the Orient. She is on trial before the world.

What will she do to solve this American-Philippine problem? What will you, her chosen representatives, do?

Yours is the power to answer. Yours is the privilege. Yours is the opportunity.

Upon your answer depends the fate of 13,000,000 people across the sea. Upon what you do to the Philippines and for the Filipino people in the near future depends the verdict of history.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under the general permission given to print I insert the following speech delivered by me over the radio Saturday, April 15, 1929:

There is nothing under the Stars and Stripes dearer to the hearts of the average American citizen than our public schools, colleges, and universities. No other agency in the social order is so vital to our national well-being as our public-school systems. They are the arteries through which circulate the very blood that nourishes the mind and conscience of our people. It is but logical therefore to declare that one of the perpetual duties of the National Government is to aid in the advancement of the school systems of the several States.

We are living in an age of scientific achievement and material progress—the age of the radio, flying machine, and fast automobile. All these things have come about through education and by no other means. You may ask then why should the National Government be concerned with the public-school systems of our several States. Why, for instance, a Department of Education? What is wrong with our public-school system? Is not the world advancing rapidly enough? I should say we have no apologies to make for the advancement of scientific achievement. Surely they are the wonders of the age. But are we giving an equal opportunity to every boy and girl in the land? Do our educational systems fully equip the coming generations to meet the changing social and economic conditions? In relative educational advantages are not our school systems spotty; that is, in some sections poor, in some fair, in some good, and in others excellent? Can this condition obtain without its bad effects upon our republican form of government, upon our national cohesiveness which was always of such deep concern of the founders of our Republic?

A startling discovery was made when America entered the World War. During the draft we found that one man in every four, when examined, did not know enough English to read a newspaper or write a letter home. One man in every five was physically unfit for any military service whatsoever. A terrible indictment of the mental and physical unfitness of a large proportion of American manhood! About one-fourth of these were native-born whites. Surely we are not living up to the democracy outlined by Thomas Jefferson, who said:

"I do most anxiously wish to see education given to all so that they may read and understand what is going on in the world and keep their part of it going on right."

The influence of changing economic conditions is being felt strongly in education. While attending the National Education Association in 1926 I heard President Hoover, who was then Secretary of Commerce, say:

"A century of scientific discovery has vastly increased the complexities of our national life. It has given us new and more complicated tools by which we have gained enormously in productivity and in standards of living. It has vastly increased the opportunities for men and women to attain that position to which their abilities and character entitle them. It has necessitated a high degree of specialization, more education, and skill. It has greatly reduced the amount of human sweat. It has given the adult a greater leisure which should be devoted to some further education. It has prolonged the period and widened the chance for the schooling of children. And from it all your responsibilities have become infinitely greater and more complex, for you must prepare each oncoming generation for this changing scene."

To meet this changing scene it was brought out in that meeting that school officials need the help of scientific investigation undertaken on a broad national scale. It was the opinion that the service of the present Bureau of Education was inadequate and that education should be given the same national status as that of agriculture, commerce, and labor.

* * * * * * * * *

The President now has in his Cabinet Secretaries whose major duties are to advance the interests of agriculture, commerce, and labor, but there is no one to do so for education, the basic element in the advancement of the other three, to say nothing of the deeper spiritual significance of education. The work of education, the foremost interest of our civilization, is shunted away in a bureau in the Department of the Interior, where little attention is paid to it by Congress because of the multiplicity of other details of that large department.

* * * * * * * * *

When people write me for information on how to raise chickens or cure hog cholera, I immediately confer with the Department of Agriculture and supply their needs; but when teachers write for information on educational problems or when high and normal school pupils write for material on subjects belonging to educational matters there is no way to get it but to search through an endless amount of unorganized matter with the hope of possibly stumbling on something that will help them. And the worst of it is we haven't even unorganized matter on their most vital subjects of inquiry.

In the past the growth of our schools has been somewhat a matter of chance; that is, there has been little scientific approach to the various problems of education, both with respect to its business administrative phases and the teaching process. We have depended too much upon individual initiative and experimentation without creating a means of evaluating and passing on to all school authorities the splendid ideas which have been and are being developed by individual experimentation. The lack of such a service has been most wasteful and our millions of children and the social order generally have suffered because the progress has been too slow to meet the needs. Certainly it can not be questioned that it is the duty of the National Government to see that her citizens are trained to meet new conditions in our constantly changing social order. This does not mean a Federal standardized school system such as that of France and Germany. It simply means the creation of an adequate fact-finding agency sufficiently equipped with funds to study and make public the best available data for the solution of the educational problems constantly arising. A department of education with a secretary in the President's Cabinet is the only agency adequate to the task.

Conceding that the administration of our schools is properly a State function, we must bear in mind that there is a duty which the National Government owes not only to the States but to its own perpetuity to see that her citizens are trained to meet the crying need for a deeper understanding of our national institutions and be not only willing but able to serve it to the fullest. "United we stand, divided we fall" expresses a basic principle in society which should find its first application in support of a mutual relationship of our State and National Governments in the matter of education. I believe that the President and a majority of the Congress of the United States recognize this fact and will give education a place in the council of the Nation such as that already enjoyed by agriculture, commerce, and labor.

A TRIBUTE TO SOLDIERS BURIED IN FOREIGN CEMETERIES

Mrs. OWEN. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the privilege of bringing to the attention of the bereaved wives and mothers of my district whose loved ones gave their lives in the World War and are buried in the cemeteries of Europe the opportunity afforded by the United States Government to make a pilgrimage to their graves.

No more gracious and appropriate action has been taken by the Congress of the United States than the authorization of the Secretary of War to arrange for the mothers and widows of all members of the military or naval forces of the United States who died in service any time between April 5, 1917, and July 1, 1921, to be taken to Europe to visit their graves.

That these pilgrimages shall be made at the expense of the Government, and that the classification of mother embraces not only the American mother but the alien mother resident here whose son gave his life for our country and the stepmother or mother through adoption of such a soldier, is a most fitting recognition.

A list of the Florida soldiers and sailors buried abroad, together with the location of their graves, is made available through the assistance of the Quartermaster General, and the Secretary of War is directed to make an investigation for the purpose of determining the number of mothers and widows entitled to make these pilgrimages during the calendar year 1930.

To those of us who were on active service, the World War is still a vivid memory and it is difficult to realize how many years have passed since the signing of the armistice. Recently I talked to a high-school student about an incident at the beginning of the World War, and she said: "That was a long time ago, wasn't it?" It was difficult for me to realize that to the high-school student of to-day the beginning of the World War was a lifetime ago.

Those years are gradually slipping away into the past, and there are times when our public, intent on the noisy claims of to-day, seems to have forgotten, but our Government recognizes that there are those who do not forget, that there are thousands of homes in our land still desolate and thousands of gold-star mothers and widows in whose hearts are enshrined the memory of those who did not return.

To-day I accompanied 47 Florida boys when they laid a wreath on the tomb of the Unknown Soldier at Arlington. Looking past that tomb which symbolizes the supreme sacrifice in war, we could see the city of Washington, crowned with the dome of our Nation's Capitol. The young Floridian who stepped forward from the group to place the wreath on the slab of marble seemed to voice the thought of all when he said: "In memory of those who died that we might live in peace."

Florida feels a solemn pride in her sons who sleep in foreign soil and bares her head in tribute as America says to their mothers and widows, "Greater love hath no man than this."

MANGANESE ORE OR FACTS VERSUS FANCY

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under general consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am printing the copy of letter written by me to my colleague, Mr. WILLIAMSON, shortly after his circular to the Members of Congress signed by Mr. LEAVITT, Mr. ARENTZ, and himself had appeared:

JUNE 5, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM WILLIAMSON,
Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT,
Hon. SAMUEL S. ARENTZ,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUES AND FRIENDS: I have a copy of your circular of May 25, which apparently was supplied to all Members of Congress, and was signed by a number in addition to yourselves.

The statement made in this circular that the 1928 imports of high-grade manganese fell off approximately 50 per cent is not in accordance with the facts, as stated on page 598 of the Summary of Tariff Information, 1929.

Before I call the attention of the other signers of this petition and other Members generally to this apparent error, I would appreciate having from you any evidence in support of your own contention that you may have.

Sincerely yours, W. R. COYLE.

In this circular he had stated that the tonnage of manganese importations had been reduced by 50 per cent in the year 1928, with the direct inference: First, that the shortage had been made up by the importation of low-grade ore free of duty which had afterwards been concentrated or beneficiated; and, second, that the remainder had come from domestic production. Since it was a matter within the scope of my own knowledge that these statements could not by any possibility be correct, I wrote to him as per the above letter. In his answer to me he again reiterated these statements, and said that while my figures had come from the Summary of Tariff Information and his had come from the Department of Commerce, that there was in fact no difference between us.

There was, as anyone could see, a very wide difference between us, and, accordingly, I asked a constituent of mine, an employee of the Bethlehem Steel Co., who is thoroughly conversant with the import situation as well as the domestic production, to collect exact figures on the subject.

I then called on the telephone my good friend and colleague the gentleman from Nevada, who had signed as a member of the committee, and asked whether he would be good enough to discuss with my constituent the disagreement between Congressman WILLIAMSON'S figures and my own. The Congressman from Nevada said that the chairman of the committee should be present, and apparently telephoned to him to meet at his office with Mr. Johnstone, my constituent.

I had thought to save the House any further discussion on this rather controversial subject and to let it close so far as I was concerned with the tabulated statement of the production and importation which was published in the RECORD of May 23. The publication by the gentleman from South Dakota of a rather bitter attack on my constituent under the leave to print, and a reiteration of the figures which I have not yet been able to check with all the facilities at my command, has caused me to change this plan.

The facts are exactly as set forth in my 1-page statement to the Members of Congress shortly after the Congress met in extra session:

First. Manganese is necessary in the production of steel.

Second. It is not available in the United States of a quality that can be used in the production of steel.

Third. Less than 5 per cent is produced by domestic producers, or a total of some 40,000 tons yearly. During the month of June, 1929, one constituent of mine will import 100,000 tons from foreign countries.

Fourth. All of the American production extending over the last 25 years will just about equal one year's consumption of this material.

Fifth. There was no low-grade ore imported and beneficiated after importation in 1928.

Sixth. There was no increase in domestic production in 1928.

Seventh. There was no decrease in American consumption in 1928.

CONCLUSION

It does seem the height of folly to tax at a rate equivalent to from 100 to 200 per cent ad valorem such ores as tungsten, magnesite, and manganese when we do not and can not produce any appreciable proportion of our own needs within this country. Anyone who reads the tariff hearings of 1922 will appreciate that the tariff on manganese was an experiment, granted at the request of a few well-organized owners of mining claims. The Members of Congress evidently relied on definite promises by these men made before both the Senate and House. These promises offered, with 1 cent per pound tariff, to produce within three years all America could use.

The only thing those glib gentlemen seem to have done under the tariff was to find a market for their mining properties and get the new owner, who bought at a high price, to come, seven years later, before Congress asking for 1½ cents per pound. The only thing these "to-day" gentlemen can possibly do, even with 1½ cents per pound, is "catch another sucker" and sell their mining claims at an inflated value and then the next tariff revision will have a new crop of would-be manganese producers asking, perhaps, for 3 cents per pound.

Does any thinking man who so holds the confidence of his electors that they will return him to Congress—does he have any idea that by attempting to punish the steel industry he can help the farmer? Does he suppose the steel industry takes this punishment without passing it on to consumer or stockholder?

I would be the last one to suggest that anyone in this Congress could have any such possible estimate of the situation. A tariff on tungsten, magnesite, and manganese is not helpful to the farmer or industry. It is a useless burden to both and a blow at the cause of national defense.

I sincerely trust that with these plain facts before them, another body now considering the tariff bill will write such reductions in this ore schedule as common sense—that so uncommon quality—would indicate.

A TRIBUTE TO SOLDIERS BURIED IN FOREIGN CEMETERIES

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am truly glad that the War Department is preparing for each State a list of those of our Nation who made the supreme sacrifice in the World War and are now buried overseas, and that Members of Congress are having these lists printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In this way we make a permanent record of the burial place of those who "gave the last full measure of devotion" on a foreign soil in behalf of their native land.

I would have asked unanimous consent to print the Georgia list in the RECORD, but was unable to get the completed list before the recess of Congress. It will be finished by the time Congress reconvenes and will then be placed in the RECORD by some Member of my State delegation.

We can never pay the debt our Nation owes to those who fought for our country, and we can never pay the debt we owe to the fathers and mothers who stayed here and suffered all the agonies of war while their children fought "over there." We should never fail to honor, by serving, in every way possible those who have served our beloved land on the battle fields of contending armies and on the greater fields of peace.

I can not help but feel that those who have served and saved our Nation in its time of peril, in war and in peace, during all our national existence, have never been half paid for the services they have rendered.

How can we pay those who are dead? It is true we can perpetuate their names in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on tablets of bronze, and on monuments of granite and never let them be forgotten by us and children of men, but still the debt can never be paid. Neither monuments nor patriotic celebrations will count for much. "It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought have thus far so nobly advanced."

Let us "highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain," and that we will honor the dead by serving the living. The greatest honor we can bestow upon the name and memory of those who made the supreme sacrifice is to defend the Constitution for which they fought; make more glorious the flag under which they died, and enact fair and wholesome laws for the fathers and mothers whom they loved.

If we would honor our heroes of all battles of war and conflicts of peace, let us live, fight, and die as they lived, fought and died, for our American institutions, for our great principles, for the purity of our citizenship, and for the everlasting preservation of our homes and our Nation. Let us honor our heroes by serving those whom they loved and for whom they lived and died.

We are solemnly bound to do this in honor of them. Nothing else will suffice for the performance of this sacred duty.

ON CIGARETTE PUBLICITY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letters:

JUNE 12, 1929.

Hon. WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY,
Chairman Federal Trade Commission,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: The campaign now being waged by the American Tobacco Co. in advertising Lucky Strike cigarettes is to my mind as deceptive as it is unfair. Vast sums of money are being spent for indoor and outdoor advertising, in the newspapers, by radio, and through other channels in a rather unusual and inequitable manner.

Attempt is being made to popularize this cigarette by constant repetition of the phrase "Reach for a Lucky instead of a sweet." There is thereby conveyed the impression that one should smoke a Lucky Strike cigarette whenever one is seized with the desire to eat something sweet, such as a piece of chocolate candy or some other confectionery.

As far as I am aware, this is the first time that one industry has tried to spread itself by disparaging another industry. The broad assertion made by the American Tobacco Co. that Lucky Strike smoking tends to make one slim is baseless and misleading. The Federal Trade Commission certainly should have jurisdiction for the purpose of curbing such deceptive advertising. The spirit as well as the letter of the Federal Trade Commission act clearly embraces unfair competition of this sort.

The candy, cocoa, and chocolate industry is one of the largest in this country and it affords employment to thousands of men and women. Millions of dollars are spent in manufacturing and distributing the products of this industry. All of this is somewhat jeopardized by the silly and outrageous form of advertising conducted by the American Tobacco Co. If the tables were turned and the company dealing in sweets were to retaliate with a slogan that cigarette smoking is a vicious habit, the American Tobacco Co. would, with loud mouthings, protest.

I therefore invoke the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission to the end that this type of advertising may be reviewed and the wretched practice of seeking to further the fortunes of the American Tobacco Co., as a result of the discomfitures and disparagement of another line of endeavor, might be stopped.

Very truly yours, EMANUEL CELLER,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Brooklyn, N. Y.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 17, 1929.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Commissioner Humphrey has directed me to acknowledge your letter of June 12, with reference to the tobacco case, and to advise that the same was brought to the attention of the commission at its recent meeting and has been placed in the files.

Very truly yours,
OTIS B. JOHNSON, Secretary.

A PROPOSED CHART FOR DEMOCRACY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of the House of Representatives I include in my remarks a statement by myself to the press on the tariff and a future course for Democracy. The statement follows:

STATEMENT TO THE PRESS JUNE 22, 1929

By LOUIS LUDLOW, Representative from the seventh Indiana district

In this vale of tears it is not always easy to ascertain where the path of duty lies. I make no secret of the fact that the closest question I have had to decide since I became a Member of Congress was how I should vote on the Hawley tariff bill. Because there undoubtedly are many good and true men and women who disagree with my vote on that measure, and because I respect and esteem them, I desire in this newspaper article to give a picture of my mind on the tariff. I do not want any of these dear friends to think that I approached the subject lightheartedly and without a realizing sense of responsibility. I gave to it many days and nights of serious, earnest thought. Being a man of some slight religious pretensions, I prayed over it, because I do not want to do anything wrong.

As I sat in the House of Representatives day after day, listening to the surging tumult of talk on the tariff bill, I was impressed by the sharp extremes of disputation and I wondered how any seeker of the truth could get even a ray of light out of the violent contradictions that ran through the debates.

WRITTEN BY ANGELS OR OLD NICK?

I gathered from the exposition of the bill by Chairman HAWLEY, of the Ways and Means Committee, that he thought the bill was written in heaven by the angels. On the other hand, if I correctly comprehended some of the opponents of the bill, they thought it was written in the realm below by the Old Nick himself. My own opinion is that it was written midway between heaven and hell by human beings who have finite vision and feet of clay. To my mind it smacks of the earth earthy. I see in it some evidences of the beatitudes, but I also see in it some traces of iniquities that might be associated with the works of the nether region. As I turned my ear day after day to the alternating currents of debate I became more and more obfuscated and even when I tossed on my pillow at night I saw before my dreamy vision a whirling phantasmagoria of angels' wings and cloven hoofs.

Because the lurid arguments in the House meant virtually nothing toward illuminating the subject I brushed away the debates and betook myself to a consideration of fundamentals. If there is one thing in the world in which I have pride it is that I am a Jeffersonian Democrat. At least I want to be, and I think I am, and when I am in doubt I delve into the philosophy of Jefferson for guidance. Jefferson advocated reasonable protective duties for the encouragement and stabilization of home industry and agriculture. Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson ("Old Hickory"), the immortal quartet of patriots who founded Democracy, were all limited protectionists. The first revenue act, passed by the First Congress, July 4, 1789, which declared in its preamble that it was intended for protection, was the handiwork of James Madison, who in its preparation counseled with his mentor, Thomas Jefferson. For 40 years in the early history of the Republic protection—reasonable in degree and general in the diffusion of its benefits—was a cardinal principle of Democratic faith.

A JEFFERSONIAN PLANK

In respect to this matter the Democratic National Convention which assembled at Houston last year returned to the teachings of the fathers when it declared for duties that will measure the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of the American laborer and for an equitable distribution of the benefits and the burdens of the tariff among all. That plank of the Houston platform could not have been more Jeffersonian if Jefferson himself had written it.

I went into the campaign last year with the Houston tariff plank on my mind. I stood on that plank. I advocated it. I gave my solemn pledge to support it if I were elected. When the Democratic national chairman telegraphed to me for a personal affirmation of my intentions I repeated my pledge by wire to him. I presume that 75 per cent of the people of the seventh district, wage earners as well as manufacturers, are protectionists. They heard my pledge or they could have heard it. They placed their confidence in me at the polls. They and all my constituents have a right to hold me responsible for a redemption of my preelection statements. I do not make promises lightly, and when I do I intend to keep them. I do not make a promise one minute and do something different the next minute.

SUGAR TARIFF ABOMINABLE

With this background of fundamental philosophy and personal promises I approached a decision as to whether or not I should vote for the Hawley tariff bill. My obligation to do so would have been perfectly clear if it were not that the Hawley bill contains, among its good provisions, a number of features which to my mind are indefensible. I think many of the rates it carries are too high and are unjustifiable. The sugar schedule is abominable. The administrative features, with their centralization of authority in the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, are objectionable if not dangerous.

My final conclusion was that in view of my commitments and my position as the Representative in Congress of a district in which protection is preponderant I would not be justified in voting to kill the tariff bill in its first stage when I did not know, and no human being could foretell, what processes of improvement it may go through in the Senate, and I accordingly voted to pass it and send it over to the other body. When I did so I had reasonable assurance from friends in the upper branch that the Senate may make the bill better. I believe it will be a more acceptable measure when it comes out of the Senate. It must be remembered that passage of the bill by the House is only the first round in the tariff battle.

VOTED FOR IT THE FIRST TIME

There are two times when a Representative has a chance to vote on a tariff measure—once when it passes the House and once when it comes back from the Senate. If the Senate improves the bill I will vote for it the second time. If the Senate makes it worse I most certainly will vote against it. I hope the Senate will change the sugar schedule so that it will conform to the proposal of Representative JOHN N. GARNER, Democratic leader of the House, who would have the tariff so arranged that when the price of sugar rises the tariff on sugar will automatically fall.

I have experienced various reactions to my tariff vote. One good friend said he thought I was right but that he could not imagine Tom Hendricks, Tom Marshall, or Sam Ralston voting for the bill. My answer to that is that never in their lives did Tom Hendricks, Tom Marshall, or Sam Ralston run for office on a platform that declared for protection. Under the circumstances that surrounded me I think they would have done just what I did. Being men of truth and honor, they would have searched their consciences and would have voted in harmony with their pledge.

NO MORE SOUP HOUSES

When I consider the tariff question the mists of years fade away and I can visualize once more my experiences of 35 years ago as a cub reporter in Indianapolis; how I made my daily visits to the soup houses, especially to one in West Pearl Street in the rear of the Commercial Club, in search of stories of human interest, and how among those long lines of sufferers waiting to receive from the hand of charity their allowance of daily bread, I gleaned tales of hunger and despair and tragic distress that would have touched the heart and inspired the pen of a Dickens or a Victor Hugo. I do not want that condition ever to happen again in Indianapolis or America, and if a moderate and reasonable protective policy such as Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson stood for, and such as the Houston platform declared for, will contribute to prevent a repetition of those pathetic scenes I am for that policy. I want everybody in the seventh district and the State of Indiana and in America to have steady employment, nourishing food, good clothing, and time and opportunity to cultivate the uplifting things of the spirit. I do not want anybody in the district I represent, possessing the inalienable rights spoken of by Jefferson and wearing the image of his Maker, to have to tread his weary way to a soup house to beg for sustenance to keep body and soul together. My vision rises to higher levels than that. I want to see a people teeming with happiness and prosperity, enjoying equal rights and opportunities, and surrounded with all of the advantages and comforts that comport with the dignity of free men and women. My position, I believe, is sound in morals, sound in economics, and sound in patriotism.

A PROPOSED CHART FOR DEMOCRACY

We are in a new era. It began last year at Houston. As I construe the action of the Democratic National Convention it recognized that America is, and always will be, a country that believes in reasonable protection, and if I were charting a future policy for the Democratic Party it would be that we Democrats should work to bring about the widest possible diffusion of the benefits of protection by standing for a tariff covering the actual difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, based on the scientific ascertainment of a nonpartisan tariff commission, and fighting all efforts to make the tariff a grab-bag for greedy, special interests; secondly, that we should do everything within our power to make peace a lasting reality throughout the world and to promote the concord of nations; and, lastly, that we should initiate a smashing drive to decentralize the tremendous authority centered at Washington, to abolish useless boards and commissions, simplify governmental processes, reduce tax rates, restore local self-government to the people and release honest business from bureaucratic interference. If we pitch our battle on that safe and sure ground every hour will bring us closer to certain victory.

I think the dawn of a new day shot across the troubled waters of American politics when the Democratic National Convention adopted the Houston platform, and I am convinced that those of us Democrats who are clothed for a moment with authority have a responsibility to see that Democracy does not slip backward toward the abyss of free trade, for however noble a theory free trade may be it is not suited to our American needs. If we permit such a tariff retrocession we will be doing our party a distinct disservice and will be erring against the best interests of the American people. The wisdom of continuing the moderate tariff plank of the Houston platform as a permanent Democratic policy is, in my judgment, not open to question. Tariff laws written by rapacious special interests will cause revolts, but there is no doubt the American people favor the principle when honestly applied. Democracy's mission is to fight for honest tariffs. I was not willing by a vote of mine to repudiate this newborn but very old principle of Democracy. I regret very much to see my party, with its great history and its matchless humanitarian record, forever courting defeat on economic issues.

ONE HEAD AND ONE HEART

It will be my ambition as long as I am a Member of Congress to do all I can in a very genuine and true way for all of the people of Indianapolis, the seventh district, and Indiana. Believe me or not, I really want to do these things, not for any material reward but because of the affection I bear to my home district and the State where I was born. I do not promise that I will not make mistakes. I have only one head to think with and one heart to love with, and it is human to err; but mine is the responsibility to act, and I will go ahead, doing always what I think is right—without hesitation and without fear.

REPORT TO CONSTITUENTS

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, with the closing of the extraordinary session of Congress, in making my report to the people who have honored me by electing me as their representative, I am constrained to say I believe the country would have been better off without the extra session.

Nearly 5,500 bills and resolutions were introduced in the House and Senate during the session. An outstanding feature was the tendency to further centralize power in the Federal Government and the extension of Federal aid by the introduction of bills advocating new projects along this line. The most prominent of these was a bill to appropriate annually over $100,000,000 for the advancement of rural education and a measure providing for an annual appropriation of over $100,000,000 a year for cooperation with the States in bettering health conditions in rural communities. Both measures should have no place among the Federal statutes but are matters that should be left entirely for determination by the various States.

I have been outspoken in my opposition to Federal-aid projects. The care of rivers and harbors and flood control is a just charge upon the Treasury of the United States, the Government assuming full control over our waterways; but unless a national emergency arises where it is necessary for the Government to stimulate activity among the States, it is my opinion that interior matters should be left to the various States for determination without financial assistance from the Federal Government.

The cost of Federal-aid projects already authorized helps to increase the enormous amount needed to carry on Federal activities. With the increase of expenditures a corresponding increase must be made in revenue-raising measures so that there will be a balance and not a deficit at the end of the year. It was predicted that the child would be neglected and the activities in the States would be discontinued when the Federal maternity and infancy act expired. This argument was advanced when efforts were made to reenact the law and make it permanent. At the first session of the legislature in Missouri, after the expiration of the Federal law, provisions were made by increasing the appropriation for the State to carry on as it had in the past. I presume other States have taken similar action.

REAPPORTIONMENT BILL

Personally I entertain the opinion the outstanding achievement of the session was the passing of the bill which provides for the taking of the census, and the reapportionment of Congress by the executive branch of the Government in the event Congress again fails to perform its constitutional duty in this respect.

As I stated when this bill was before the House, I disliked to support a measure which transferred to the executive branch a duty imposed by the Constitution on Congress, but I found consolation in the fact that Congress will have three months to perform this duty, and not unless Congress fails again to act will the executive branch have the power to reapportion.

The outstanding feature of the legislation is that the House will be reapportioned on the basis of the census of 1930, and some thirty million people now residing in the large cities and now deprived of proper representation due to Congress failing to reapportion since 1911 will secure the representation to which they are entitled.

From forty to fifty representatives now credited to rural districts will be succeeded by representatives from the urban centers, when the Country is properly reapportioned.

The influence of the Anti-Saloon League and kindred organizations prevented reapportionment in the past because the representatives of these organizations knew their influence was more pronounced among Congressmen elected from rural districts than among those elected from the cities.

That I have no selfish motives is evidenced by the fact that I assisted in forcing my own retirement as a member of this body, in voting for the bill because when my State is properly redistricted I can not expect to be reelected. It will be impossible to so arrange a district in St. Louis and place the required number of voters in my district, and make it less than a 10,000 Republican majority, which I could hardly expect to overcome.

FARM RELIEF

I opposed the passage of the farm relief bill because I did not feel it would be beneficial to the farmers. The man who walks behind the plow and not the speculator is the one I desire to assist. The condition of the producer is such that he is without funds. He is required to mortgage his crop when he places it in the ground. When the crop is available the loan is called and he is forced to turn over his crop regardless of the condition of the market. The holder of the loan retains the crop until the market rises, and he and not the producer will get the benefit of any increase in price that might result from the activity of the Farm Board. There are no provisions in the law to assist the producer in so far as borrowing on his crops so he can repay his loan and hold his commodities until the market price has advanced.

New methods must be found for the use of farm products and what is now going to waste on the farm. The surplus must be absorbed. When an amendment was offered, both in the House and Senate, to use the surplus for the manufacture of cereal beverages and wines of an alcoholic content not in violation of the eighteenth amendment it was promptly defeated. Did the so-called friend of the farmer think of the farmer then or did he think of the Anti-Saloon League when he voted on the amendment? The passage of this amendment would probably have contributed more toward solving the farm problem than anything that could be done at this time.

The real farm problem did not present itself until after the enactment of the prohibition amendment. Some day the farmers will realize they assisted in bringing about present conditions by advocating prohibition for they destroyed a market for hundreds of millions of bushels of their products when the manufacture of cereal beverages and light wines was discontinued.

TARIFF BILL

In opposing the tariff bill I contend I was supporting the President who strongly urged only a limited revision. The bill as it passed the House provided for a general revision and while it increased rates on agricultural products, at the same time it further extended to the special interests advantages far in excess of any benefits the farmer might receive.

The bill as it reached the Senate carried increases over the present law that will add over $600,000,000 to the burden now placed upon the American public. It is sincerely hoped that the Senate, where debate is unlimited, and where amendments can be offered, will comply with the President's suggestion for a limited revision.

That section of the law which will give the President the power to raise or lower duties 50 per cent, if in his opinion conditions warrant such action, should be stricken from the bill. It takes from the Congress the constitutional authority to raise and levy taxes. It must be remembered that if this section becomes a law it would take a two-third vote of both Houses to repeal it, provided the President were opposed to repeal. He could veto any act repealing the legislation and it would require two-thirds of both Houses to pass the measure over his veto. Should this feature be retained on final passage a President could lower or raise every duty in the law 50 per cent, and there could be no appeal from his decision other than by congressional act, and if the action of Congress were not to his liking, the President could veto the bill. Under our form of government it is too much power to place in the hands of any one man, even the President of the United States.

The business interests of the country should give thought to this far-reaching legislation and rise in opposition before it is too late. Business men should remember that if one were elected President who believed in a low tariff or free trade he could immediately provide for a 50 per cent reduction on all schedules; or, on the other hand, he could, if he were in favor of practically placing an embargo on foreign-made products, provide for a 50 per cent increase on all schedules. Stop for an instant and think what would result if such action were taken in either direction.

Members of the House were deprived of an opportunity of offering an amendment to the bill unless the committee opened up the paragraph by suggesting a change.

Buried in the bill will be found two lines providing for the repeal of section 2804 of the Revised Statutes. This law, passed 50 years ago, limits importations of cigars to lots of 3,000. Efforts have been made for years to repeal this law upon the demand of the Republic of Cuba. On one occasion the House, by a record-vote, declined to repeal. In the Seventieth Congress the Rules Committee refused a special rule. Still the committee, without giving those interested the right to be heard, included the provision in the bill. It means if the paragraph is retained by the Senate that the American cigar industry will be seriously affected because a mail order business of large proportion will immediately be inaugurated. Cuba at the present time is not raising all the tobacco now labeled Habana tobacco. It imports tobacco and sells it as Habana tobacco. Cigars of an inferior grade of tobacco will be shipped into this country classed as Habana cigars and the cigar makers of this country will be forced to seek other fields in order to maintain themselves and their families.

The taking of hides, leather, and shoes off the free list can not be defended. It simply increases the shoe bill of every person in the United States and does not benefit the skilled shoe worker, nor will the $25,000,000 increase in the price of hides benefit the farmer who sells his cattle on hoof. On the other hand, the farmer will be required to pay an increase in the price of shoes for his family.

I predict the tariff act of 1929, if not rewritten by the Senate, will cause the American public to revolt against those responsible for its enactment.

IMMIGRATION QUESTION

The immigration question was one that could well have received some attention at the extraordinary session. The unemployment situation has reached a stage which demands that everything possible be done to alleviate conditions. We are now permitting 164,647 aliens a year to enter this country. In 10 years this means 1,646,470. These people must earn a living; and being accustomed to low wages abroad and not to our standard of living, accept employment at wages below those paid the American laborer.

In my opinion it would have been well to have repealed the national-origins provision of the immigration act of 1924. People of German and Irish descent feel that this provision discriminates against Germany and the Irish Free State, and they are justified in so thinking.

Three times three Cabinet officers have made reports to the President, and one of the Cabinet officers was President Hoover himself, submitting figures based on the census of 1790, and in each instance they declined to certify to the correctness of the figures.

It has been shown that men who served in the Revolutionary War with General Washington were not listed in the census of 1790. Still some would try to make one believe that it is possible to learn the national origin of the people of the United States through that census.

I feel if this provision were repealed there would be practically no objection to reducing immigration, provided the quota were based upon the census of 1890 or on the same basis that has prevailed since the enactment of the law of 1924. Such action would remove from the minds of the people of German and Irish descent the feeling that now exists that these countries have been subject to discrimination. The failure of the Senate to permit a vote upon the repeal of the national-origin clause prevented the House from taking any action.

The national-origin clause should be repealed when the regular session of Congress convenes, and then the question of reducing the quota should be taken up. The national-origin clause will not achieve what its supporters claim for it. It will work directly opposite to their expectations.

Machinery has reduced the man power necessary in this country at the present time. This, together with improved methods adopted by big business, has caused unemployment to such an extent that the National Government soon must give attention to the question. Under the census law a census of the unemployed will be taken.

The mining industry, always overbuilt from the standpoint of labor, is vitally affected by the use of electricity and oil for power purposes. All railroads to the south and southwest burn oil in locomotives from a point 100 miles out of St. Louis. Coal is cheaper for the first 100 miles, while a saving is effected by the use of oil for the rest of the journey. The miners are moving to the cities, thus increasing the number of unemployed in the industrial centers.

FRENCH DEBT SETTLEMENT

The last bill considered and passed by the House was the French debt settlement bill. It provided for the postponement of the payment of $400,000,000 due the United States August 1, 1920. This amount represents money due the United States, not for a loan, but for the payment by France for surplus supplies bought by France from the United States after the close of the war. I opposed this postponement because the hearings show the amount represents about one third of the cost of the supplies to the United States, transportation charges not being included; and further, because it has been said, and not denied, that the French sold part of the supplies to other foreign countries and received payment for same. Therefore, I feel the United States should at least be paid for the goods purchased by France when the payment becomes due.

The French debt settlement was most liberal, as can be shown from the fact that it is now costing the American public $171,000,000 a year interest on the bonds floated during the war to raise money to loan to France, while France is paying us at this time but $30,000,000 a year interest. Thus it is shown the American people are shouldering a burden annually of $141,000,000 that France should pay for the loans advanced by the United States.

PROHIBITION AND LAW ENFORCEMENT

Prohibition and law enforcement has been discussed for days in both the House and Senate. Drys as well as wets have voiced their objections to the unrestrained activities in the use of sawed-off shotguns by prohibition enforcement officers. The wanton destruction of human life, many innocent victims being recorded among those killed in recent months, has aroused the Members as well as the people generally.

The shooting at automobiles on the public highway, which has caused the death of several people in the last few weeks, was condemned. The discussions served to make more apparent to one who understands the situation that the Prohibition Unit is now engaged in a final attempt to make the law effective regardless of the cost.

Stills destroyed in Washington the past week showed they had a capacity of over 40,000 gallons per day. When stills capable of producing 160,000 quarts of liquor a day are destroyed close to the seat of the National Capital one can realize without further comment that prohibition as it exists in this country to-day is a farce.

The President, following his campaign promise, has appointed a commission to investigate the prohibition question, and the report will be anxiously awaited. It is to be regretted, however, that one of the first acts of this commission was to hold its session behind closed doors. The public is entitled to know what evidence is submitted and if open sessions are not held its final judgment will be subject to criticism.

Those favoring prohibition—I am speaking now of the class who care not for the cost to the American public either from the standpoint of the health of the community or the general welfare of the people—have even gone so far as to urge that the marines be directed by President Hoover to enter the enforcement field. They are willing to go to any extreme in order to justify their view that prohibition can be enforced. The President, however, has indicated that he would not approve of the use of the marines for this purpose, holding, it is said, that enforcement was a matter for the civil authorities, and further, that it would be unlawful to bring into the picture the armed forces in the absence of an appeal from the several States. This only goes to show how desperate this class of people are when the prohibition question is involved.

Concluding, I might add I have continued the policy of promptly responding to all legitimate calls made upon me for assistance in connection with Federal activities.

I have cooperated with the civic organizations of St. Louis with a view to securing for our city the recognition to which it is entitled from the Government, and will continue to do so.

After disposing of pending matters requiring personal attention at the various departments, I will remain in Washington for the hearing during July on the establishment of the direct air-mail route from St. Louis to New York, at which time I will appear in support of the project, and will then return to St. Louis, where I will be available during the time Congress is not in session.

GREAT LAKES-HUDSON WATERWAY CONVENTION

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert a speech delivered by me at the Great Lakes-Hudson Waterway Convention, held in the Hotel Ten Eyck, Albany, N. Y., on June 12, 1929.

The speech is as follows:

The advocates of the construction of an ocean ship canal from the port of New York up the Hudson River to the Great Lakes have met with unreasoning and bitter opposition from the Middle and Central Western States, which know little or nothing of the merits of the project, but have jumped in blindly behind the St. Lawrence ship canal, due to a vast amount of clever propaganda with which they have been flooded by selfish interests. There is no denying the fact that the States from Ohio to Wisconsin have been delivered hook, line, and sinker to the St. Lawrence project, and already dream of a golden flood of commerce passing by Montreal and making Cleveland, Detroit, and Duluth the leading ports for export and import in the United States or Canada. This mirage is so pleasing that the inhabitants of these cities can almost see the harvest of the world's goods on their docks and have actually begun to count the profits. The result is that the propaganda is carried on with renewed vigor for the St. Lawrence Canal by States that fail totally to understand that the all-American route would be equally beneficial to their interests.

The State of New York has offered to turn over to the Federal Government the State barge canal, free of charge, to be developed into an ocean ship canal from Troy to Buffalo, or by way of Troy to Oswego on Lake Ontario, which is less than one-half the distance. For the past eight years, ever since I have been in Congress, the Representatives of the farmers from the Central Western States and from the lake cities have been promising their constituents that they were about to start building the St. Lawrence route to permit ships to go direct from the interior of the United States to Europe with the grain and products of the West. Many of the Middle Western States have voted money to carry on propaganda for the St. Lawrence canal, without appreciating that the all-American route is just as feasible and in many respects more advantageous to their interests.

What the farmers of the West want is a waterway to the Atlantic Ocean. They do not care whether it goes through New York or by the St. Lawrence River. They are seeking relief from the high freight rates on their wheat and other produce by the development of a waterway for ocean-going ships from the Great Lakes to the sea. The importance and necessity of such a project is conceded by all fair-minded Americans, and indorsed by both Republican and Democratic nominees for the Presidency in the recent national campaign.

The great farming element of the West wants a direct outlet to the sea, thereby making a saving of from 5 to 8 cents on a bushel of wheat to European ports. Everyone admits the justice of the farmers' plea for cheaper transportation by the construction of an ocean ship canal to the Great Lakes, but the American farmer wants immediate action, not discussions on the merits or demerits of the proposed routes. They want to get some use out of the project during their lifetime, and the best practicable way is to take over the New York State Barge Canal and deepen it at the very earliest moment. The only way to begin is to begin; and the main obstruction at present comes from the misunderstanding and confusion that has arisen in the Middle West regarding the all-American route via the Hudson River.

The all-American route is merely a term for purposes of designation or description. It might be more accurate and fairer, as all the Canadian portions of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence system are open to American shipping, and vice versa, to speak of the all-American route as the Hudson River waterway. It has so many advantages over the St. Lawrence project that it is not necessary to arouse patriotic sentiment to come to its defense.

Unfortunately, an amazing myth has been developed regarding the advantages of the St. Lawrence route which has taken firm hold in some of the Western States. This myth supported by extensive propaganda both from the power interests and Middle Western States, has helped to keep alive the St. Lawrence project which, due to the united opposition of Montreal and the Province of Quebec, has practically no chance of ever being built.

The Hudson River is a natural waterway, and one of the most marvelous that nature has bestowed upon the United States. For a distance of 150 miles, with the dredging already provided for between Hudson and Albany, it is navigable for ocean ships, and that is the reason that it is selected as the logical waterway to the inland lakes and not because it happens to run through New York State. The distance from Troy to Oswego on Lake Ontario is 186 miles, whereas the distance from Montreal to Lake Ontario is 181 miles. The Hudson River route follows natural rivers or lakes, such as the canalized Mohawk River for 85 miles, Lake Oneida for 21 miles, Oneida River for 7 miles, and Oswego River for 22 miles. It is surprising that there should be any objection to the proposed route from Middle Western States, whose development was assured a century ago by the building of the Erie Canal.

It is true that the original development and prosperity of the port of New York was due to the trade and commerce that flowed in steady streams from the Middle West through the Erie Canal, and it is equally true that the St. Lawrence canal project would be a direct menace to the prosperity, commerce, and trade of the port of New York and a heavy blow to the shipping interests of that great port. It is sheer nonsense, however, for the proponents of the St. Lawrence canal to speak of the tribute exacted by New York, or that the harbor is already choked with shipping. There is no congestion of commerce in the port of New York, which has ample space for 500 miles of docks, including Staten Island and New Jersey, and another hundred miles or more up the Hudson River. It is sheer propaganda to speak of tribute. New York has no monopoly; but commerce flows there simply because of its location and facilities.

The western producer forgets that the lion's share of his products, particularly grain, is consumed in such States as New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New England, and that the St. Lawrence route would add an additional thousand miles carriage to all our eastern seaports. I resent the frequent charge of selfishness hurled at New York for opposing the St. Lawrence canal project and advocating the Hudson River route on its merits in the interest of over 30,000,000 of people on the Atlantic seaboard and 11,000,000 alone in the State of New York.

I would suggest that this convention recommend to the New York State Legislature the creation of a commission to be appointed by the legislature to examine and report the most feasible ocean-ship-canal route from Troy to the Great Lakes, with estimates as to the cost of construction, having in view the desirability or practicability of using and deepening portions of the State barge canal at the expense of the State, with power to collect tolls.

Senator WALSH of Montana advocated the St. Lawrence route to a Boston audience a year or so ago, but carried away by his eloquence he failed to inform the hard-headed people of New England that the Hudson River waterway to Lake Ontario would bring the produce of the West to Albany just as cheaply as the St. Lawrence, and that both Albany and New York are much nearer and more accessible to Boston, Providence, and Hartford than the city of Montreal. The millions of people living in New England are as much interested as the farmers of the West in cheap transportation on the food products which they consume. The mouth of the St. Lawrence is a thousand miles farther from Boston than Albany, Troy, or New York. The grandiose scheme for cheap water power advocated by Senator WALSH can be put into effect just as well without the construction of an ocean ship canal on the international section of the St. Lawrence River, provided the Canadian Government will consent to the exportation of jointly owned water power.

I know of no issue that has been before Congress for a long time about which there has been so much misinformation and misunderstanding. The speeches in Congress in favor of the St. Lawrence Canal have invariably made confusion worse confounded, as they never take into consideration the Canadian viewpoint. It is apparently taken for granted that the Canadian Government will be delighted to have a kind of Panama Canal Zone connecting the Great Lakes with the St. Lawrence River. However, the idea is farthest from the Canadian conception of their own sovereignty. The paramount objection to the construction of the St. Lawrence Ship Canal is the city of Montreal, with a population of in excess of a million, and united against surrendering her position as shipping center of Canada to some American inland city. In her opposition, Montreal has the practically undivided support of the Province of Quebec, which has a population of approximately one-third of Canada. This opposition is strong enough to block the passage of a treaty between Canada and the United States which would be necessary before a spade of earth could be turned. Among other contributing factors which lend weight to the opposition, to the proposed canal in Canada, are the Canadian railway systems. The Canadian people have invested heavily in their great transcontinental railroads, and naturally are anxious to have them pay dividends. If the railroads lose all the transportation of grain the Canadian Government would hesitate a long time before appropriating for one-half the cost of the canal, or $300,000,000 when she needs every dollar for other necessary improvements and developments, and is already burdened with debt.

The Canadians very generally look upon the proposed St. Lawrence canal under joint control as an American power grab, which would menace the hydroelectric prestige of the Dominion. Canada is opposed to the exportation of her water power and will fight any attempt to exploit the power latent in the St. Lawrence on the part of American capitalists and the mortgaging of it to American corporations at a time when Canadian industry is not yet ready to absorb it. Furthermore, although the St. Lawrence route is the shorter, it is ice bound for five months in the winter and fog bound for a large part of the summer, and in addition the sea lanes are menaced by icebergs.

If this were not so, the big passenger liners would long ago have landed in Montreal instead of New York. From whatever angle you look at it, I am convinced that the advocates of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes project are wasting their efforts on a lost cause and thereby preventing the construction of the only feasible route—via the Great Lakes to the Hudson River. Time is of the essence if relief is to be afforded the American farmer in our day and generation; why waste it on a snare and a delusion when the same results can be accomplished immediately through American territory and by use of American dollars for the benefit of 30,000,000 of Americans in the Central and great North West, and 30,000,000 more on the Atlantic seaboard?

In the last analysis it should not be forgotten that New York State has a legal right to partial control of the St. Lawrence River and has no inclination to surrender its sovereign rights. Furthermore, New York State has 2 Senators and 43 Representatives who will have both a voice and a vote in deciding upon the most feasible ship canal from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean.

The New York State Legislature is willing to give the State barge canal, from Albany to Buffalo, to the Federal Government to be made into an all-American ship canal, and if that is not practicable there is the shorter Oswego-Albany route. New York State taxpayers will be called upon to pay a third of the total cost, whatever inland ship canal is built, and it is only fair that they should let their views be known.

The American people have a fixed idea that the politicians in Canada are staying awake nights scheming how to persuade the United States Government to enter into a treaty to build the St. Lawrence River ship canal project. The Middle Western States are convinced that everyone in Canada is clamoring to start digging the canal immediately. I have tried to show that public opinion in Canada is divided and that the Province of Quebec, representing one-third of the population, is practically united in its opposition, and that the balance of Canada, with the exception of such cities as Toronto, Fort Arthur, and Winnipeg are not greatly interested. Remembering the old adage that "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread," I predict that the construction of the St. Lawrence canal project is no more feasible or attainable than the repeal of the eighteenth amendment in our day and generation. If the farmers really want cheaper transportation they have only one course to pursue, and that is to urge Congress to make an appropriation to start building a ship canal from the Great Lakes to the Hudson River.

Finally, let me point out that no matter which route is constructed by the Federal Government, of course New York State would have to contribute 30 per cent of the taxes. Imagine the farce and travesty of calling upon the taxpayers of New York State to pay one-third of the cost of the St. Lawrence ocean ship canal, the completion of which would be a direct menace to the trade, commerce, and prosperity of the port of New York, Albany, Troy, and the entire State. If we have to pay one-third of the taxes for the St. Lawrence route, I would vastly prefer having the State of New York build the Hudson River-Great Lakes waterway with its own money and charging tolls.

THE LIBERTY BELL IN ALLENTOWN, PA.

Mr. ESTERLY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a statement in connection with House Joint Resolution 110 which I recently introduced in the House, authorizing and requesting the Postmaster General to design and issue a special postage stamp commemorating the hiding of the Liberty Bell at Allentown, Lehigh County, Pa., during the period of the Revolutionary War. The statement follows:

FIRST VISIT OF BELL TO ALLENTOWN

It was to Allentown (or Northampton, as the struggling village was then known) that the Liberty Bell made its first trip. In September, 1777, a little more than a year after the bell had fired the hearts of the patriots by proclaiming "freedom throughout the land," the British became rather too numerous for comfort in the vicinity of Philadelphia. At a meeting of the executive council it was decided to send the Liberty Bell, together with the chimes and tower bell of Christ Church and the tower bell of St. Peter's Church, 11 bells in all, to some distant settlement. The British were in need of ammunition, and what a delight it would have been to them to convert the herald of freedom into cannon balls.

The patriotism and loyalty to the continental cause of the citizens of Northampton (Allentown) were well known to the executive council, and it was decided to intrust the Liberty Bell in the care of the people of this village.

The following entry was made in the diary of the Moravian Church at Bethlehem, under the date of September 25, 1777:

"The bells from Philadelphia brought in wagons. The wagon with the statehouse bell broke down here, so it had to be unloaded. The other bells went on."

John Jacob Mickley drove the team on which the Liberty Bell was loaded. After his wagon broke down Frederick Leaser, another farmer, came along and the bell was loaded on his wagon and the journey to Northampton (Allentown) resumed.

Arriving at this place the bells, together with the church chimes, were hidden underneath the floor of the old Zion Reformed Church, the pastor, Rev. Abraham Blumer, assisting in the concealment. Here the bells remained until after the evacuation of Philadelphia by the British in the latter part of 1778, when they were taken back to Philadelphia.

SECOND VISIT OF BELL TO ALLENTOWN

In marked contrast with the first trip of the bell to Allentown was its triumphal entry into the city on its second visit on Friday, October 27, 1893. The priceless relic had been on exhibition at the World's Fair in Chicago, which commemorated the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America. Its trip home to Independence Hall, Philadelphia, was one round of ovations and receptions. The biggest and grandest reception of all it received at the hands of the residents of Allentown. Preparations for the ceremonies in its honor were started weeks prior to the date, and its arrival there found tens of thousands of people lined upon the streets to watch its removal to Zion Church, where just 116 years previously it had been sheltered by Allentown in its time of peril.

THE FIRST DEFENDERS OF READING, PA., IN THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR

Mr. ESTERLY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include a statement in connection with House Joint Resolution No. 115, which I recently introduced in the House, authorizing and requesting the Postmaster General to design and issue a special postage stamp commemorating the arrival of Captain Nagle's company, known as the First Defenders, of Reading, Berks County, Pa., at Cambridge, Mass., they being the first volunteers to arrive in response to Gen. George Washington's call for troops at the outbreak of the Revolutionary War. The statement follows:

On June 14, 1775, the second Continental Congress passed resolutions requiring 12 companies of expert riflemen to be raised for the purpose of joining the Army near Boston. Eight of these companies were to be raised in Pennsylvania, formed into a battalion, and commanded by officers recommended by the assembly. The command formed of these companies was called "Colonel Thompson's battalion of riflemen."

One company in this battalion was from Reading. It was commanded by Capt. George Nagle.

It has been absolutely proven by the Berks County Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Reading, Pa., that Nagle's company was the first to arrive at Cambridge, Mass., after this call. They arrived on Tuesday, July 25, 1775. In the New York City Library files of the Pennsylvania Journal and the Weekly Advertiser may be found. In the issue of August 9, 1775, appears a letter from a correspondent dated "Camp at Cambridge, July 28." The following is stated therein: "The Reading company of riflemen came in on Tuesday; the rest are hourly expected and much wanted." As no previous notation had appeared concerning the arrival of any troops of riflemen, and since the letter states "the rest are hourly expected and much wanted," the fact is proven conclusively that no other troops had yet arrived.

The appearance of the men in this battalion of riflemen was described as follows (see Thatcher's Military Journal of Revolution, August, 1775):

"They are remarkably stout and hardy men, many of them exceeding 6 feet in height. They are dressed in white frocks or rifle shirts and round hats. These men are remarkable for the accuracy of their aim, striking a mark with great certainty at 200 yards distance. At a review, while on a quick advance, a company of them fired their balls into objects of 7 inches diameter at the distance of 250 yards. They are now stationed in our lines, and their shot have frequently proved fatal to British officers and soldiers who expose themselves to view even at more than double the distance of common musket shot. Each man bore a rifle-barreled gun, a tomahawk or small ax, and a long knife, usually called a 'scalping knife,' which served for all purposes in the woods. His underdress—by no means in military style—was covered by a deep ash-colored hunting shirt, leggins, and moccasins—if the latter could be procured."

The research work done by the Berks County Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, of Reading, Pa., concerning the arrival of Nagle's troops at Cambridge has been deposited among the records of the Historical Society of Berks County, Reading, Pa., where it can be seen at any time.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE DEBENTURE PLAN

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, there is no occasion for debate as to the need of economic adjustment in our agriculture. Our farmers in many lines—notably, for example, in some of the staple crops—are not sharing in the general national prosperity. Common justice demands that they should, and as a nation we must see that they do, not only upon the selfish grounds of assuring the continuity of our food supply but because it is not right nor desired by any group of our people that one part of the Nation shall prosper while another languishes.

This serious condition of some branches of American agriculture has led in the past few years to the invention of many legislative devices in an effort to produce an instant cure of a deep-seated and puzzling series of economic diseases. Of these, the latest idea is the so-called debenture plan.

The debenture plan, as it was set out in the Senate amendments to the House farm relief bill, is indistinguishable in its effects from straight subsidy or bounty, but is infinitely more complicated in its operations and nowhere near as direct in its effect upon price. It is cast in the form of a debenture only to avoid the true name it should bear—subsidy.

The amendment provides that whenever the Farm Board finds it advisable with respect to any agricultural commodity—which under the act may be anything from cotton stalks to fresh peaches—it may direct the Secretary of the Treasury to begin the issuance of certificates, called export debentures, to any exporter of any such commodity grown in the United States or of anything manufactured from it. These debenture certificates do not call for the payment of cash but may be used by any importer in payment of tariff duties on imported articles. They are to be issued in an amount equal to one-half of the existing tariff rate which would have to be paid upon imports of the commodity, except in the case of cotton where there is no tariff and the rate is specified to be 2 cents per pound. On the manufactured goods the rate shall be such as equals what the rate would have been if the raw material used had been exported.

The Senate amendment further provides that if the board finds at the beginning of any crop year—and it does not specify whether the beginning of a crop year of wheat, for example, is the time of the planting of winter wheat for next year's harvest, or the time of harvest—that the probable production of any commodity will exceed the 5-year average production by more than 20 per cent but less than 40 per cent, there shall be a reduction in the debenture rate of 20 per cent, and similarly for other increases in the estimated probable production.

It is the theory that this will force the export of American commodities so long as their price here is less than their value abroad, plus the amount of the debenture or subsidy.

It is perfectly obvious that this plan is simply a straight subsidy payable in securities which have a sale value instead of cash. The only purpose of the issuance of the securities instead of cash is political. The advocates of the plan know perfectly well that a direct cash subsidy proposal would be exceedingly unpopular—and nowhere more than with the farmers of America. They, therefore, have invented the plan of issuing securities and the use of the word "debenture" to camouflage their real purpose. This is bad enough in itself but worse in view of its effect on the amount the farmers will receive, as I think I can clearly show.

In any reasonable space, it is impossible adequately to discuss this proposal and explain its many fallacies, and I can point out, therefore, only two or three of the most vital defects.

To begin with, it proposes a direct subsidy to the owner of wheat or cotton, for example, on the date the board decides to award the debenture. As of May 1, when the Senate was considering the debenture plan, practically all of last year's wheat crop had passed from the hands of the farmers into those of the speculative and milling interests. The price of wheat was disastrously depressed, and the board would probably have decided to award a debenture immediately in order to stimulate that price. The rate of debenture would be 21 cents, half the tariff of 42 cents. The millers and speculative traders had on May 1 nearly 300,000,000 bushels of wheat which they owned. The establishment of a debenture plan then, therefore, would instantly have given them a present of $63,000,000 on stocks on hand, not one cent of which would have gone to the farmer who produced the wheat. Like sums would go to the packers and other owners of previously raised farm commodities. Probably over $200,000,000 would go at once to trade interests and almost nothing to the farmers who have sold their last year's crops.

Our whole structure for handling commodities is built upon orderly marketing, which implies the ability to get a contract for future supplies on the part of our manufacturers. Our central storage capacity is limited and anything that forces the movement of our commodities on a cash and immediate delivery basis would so congest our facilities as inevitably to result in lower prices. Whatever may be thought of futures trading in commodities, it is certain that we want trading in America under our control to have some voice in the control of price, and not leave it entirely to Liverpool or some foreign point. Otherwise, certainly our domestic producers, unadvised as to world-wide commodity price conditions, will suffer.

The debenture plan would immediately destroy all dealings in commodities for future delivery, and reduce the market to a cash basis and immediate delivery in this country. This is because the debenture rate is arranged to change with any change in the tariff, and also under certain conditions might be changed by an estimate of increased production. The tariff is, of course, subject to change either by Congress or by the President on a report from the Tariff Commission.

Consequently, no one in America would buy except for immediate delivery, because he would not be advised how long the tariff rate or the amount of the debenture subsidy would remain unchanged—nor indeed whether Congress might not repeal it altogether. Wheat, cotton, and other commodities, however, are used the world over, and there would still exist futures markets in Liverpool and other foreign countries which would fix the world price. The maximum that any prospective exporter would therefore pay for delayed delivery would be the Liverpool price on the date of purchase, with perhaps—but not certainly—some allowance for the speculative chance that he might get a subsidy when the time came to ship the commodity abroad.

American manufacturers, some of whose processes of conversion of the raw material take many months, will certainly hesitate to buy commodities for manufacture at any higher price than the world market, since, before their manufacturing operations are completed, the export subsidy may be withdrawn by the board or reduced in amount by an estimate of increased production in the following year or by change in the tariff, so that they will then be in the position of having paid more for their raw material than their foreign competitors but unable to secure a return of this excess cost when they export the finished goods.

From all of these considerations it results that the amount of the debenture, if the plan is ever to operate, must be permanently fixed for a long period ahead, and that announcements of change in rate must likewise be made a long time ahead. It was conceded in the Senate—and the provision for decreasing of the amount of the debenture therefore inserted—that a straight bounty without penalty for increase in production would certainly increase production. We are, therefore, faced with the choice between a plan that definitely promises to increase production by guaranteeing the continuance of the export bounty for a definite and long-term period, or one which absolutely disrupts all existing channels of handling our commodities; leaves the fixing of price absolutely in the hands of foreigners; and, at the same time, will result in the greater part of the debenture subsidy going to the speculator, the manufacturer, or the exporter rather than to the producer.

There is still another powerful objection, which is that all nations including ours, for the protection of their own producers, levy a protective duty on imports equal to the amount of subsidies paid by any exporting nation. For example, even between Dominions of the same Empire, Canada a year or two ago placed a duty upon butter from Australia equal to the amount of the bounty paid by Australia on exports of butter.

The net result of this, of course, is to wipe out the subsidy and leave the domestic price unchanged but to cost the American Treasury the full amount of the debenture which it pays the exporter and which he in turn pays as a tariff duty to the nation to which he exports the commodity. We thus find our Nation, including our farmers, helping to pay the taxes otherwise payable to their governments by the people of Great Britain, Germany, and other foreign nations.

Further, it was conceded in the Senate that if any commodity was promised a subsidy by way of debenture the production and therefore the surplus would increase. But still they want to promise a subsidy when all admit our troubles come from too much surplus. The Senate evidently anticipated that this increase might easily run 160,000,000 bushels a year in wheat and 250,000,000 bales of cotton, for they provide for no decrease in the amount of the debenture until the increase exceeds these figures. But the increase of a mere 100,000,000 bushels in the normal world supply of wheat would almost certainly decrease the world price 20 cents a bushel, and an increase of 1,000,000 bales of cotton would take more than 2 cents a pound off its price. In a year of normal crops elsewhere, the Senate's anticipated probable increase in production would break the world price of wheat over 40 cents a bushel and of cotton of over 5 cents a pound.

That these figures are not extreme is completely demonstrated by this year's wheat market. The estimated supply of wheat as of May 1 was approximately 167,000,000 bushels higher than the like estimated supply a year ago, and the price of wheat June 1 was nearly 50 cents lower than it then was and promised to go still lower. If, therefore, the minimum increase which the Senate anticipates as the probable result of the adoption of this plan should occur, the world price would be decreased at least 40 cents in order to give some American farmers a subsidy at the very best of 21 cents. The greater part of the subsidy, as I have stated, would never reach the farmer's pocket, but rather would go to the exporter. If he did get it all, however, he would thus get on wheat 21 cents a bushel above the world price, but the world price would be 40 cents lower, so that he would receive net 19 cents less than under present conditions.

The cost of the subsidy would be at the lowest estimate $175,000,000 a year, even without increased production. Of this the farmer, who pays 30 per cent of our taxes, would pay something over $52,000,000 a year for the purpose in a normal year of world production, of getting less for his product than he now receives. My own belief is that it would cost at least double this amount.

Another major objection to this whole proposal is that since the debentures are not payable in cash but only usable in payment of tariff duties on imports, they will always sell at a discount. For example, the exporters of cotton from Galveston will secure a large number of debentures at the season when cotton is being exported. Imports to Galveston at the same period will require far less for tariff than the debentures which will be issued against cotton. Consequently, the holder of a debenture will have to sell it for what it will bring for use somewhere else, or at a later date.

Consequently, a regular trade will be built up in these debentures which will sell at varying rates of discount, and a large part of the subsidy which might otherwise go to the farmer will go to the brokers and traders in these certificates. When this is added to the other uncertainties due to possible changes in the tariff and debenture rates, it is perfectly clear that the farmer will secure at the very best only a fraction of the amount that the debenture will be worth to the importer of foreign goods when he comes to pay his tariff.

The debenture plan would not only have wrought a great injury to the farmers and to the whole Nation if it had become law but its injection into this special session of Congress has already wrought serious damage. On the 1st day of April, July wheat closed in Chicago at $1.22½ a bushel. On the 15th, when Congress met in special session to consider farm relief legislation, the price was $1.26½. This rise, despite an abnormal world surplus, was clearly stated in the press, and by speculative wheat houses in their letters to their customers as due to the expectation of prompt farm relief legislation. The House Committee on Agriculture immediately reported a bill substantially the same as the one which has now become law. Practically simultaneously, the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry voted to report a bill containing the debenture plan. The price of wheat started immediately downward, and continued downward each week closing—omitting fractions of a cent for convenience—at $1.19 on April 20, $1.16 on April 27, $1.15 on May 4, $1.08 on May 11, $1.05 on May 18, $1.04 on May 25, and selling to a low of 96 cents on May 31. It then became apparent to the country that the House had no intention of acquiescing in the debenture plan, but would insist upon a bill containing rational stabilization corporation provisions, and the price slowly steadied until by June 15, when the bill was signed, July wheat closed at $1.08 and has this week passed $1.15. In the 46 days during which the world thought the debenture plan possibly would become law, July wheat declined over 30 cents a bushel. In the 24 days since it became certain that it would not become law, the price recovered 19 cents—of which 8 cents was in the eight days after the President signed the bill as finally agreed upon.

Any effort to inject this absurdly unworkable proposal into any other legislation will be followed by the same effect.

On the other hand, the great value to the American farmer of the stabilization corporation plan of farm relief is graphically shown in two ways. In the first place, it is shown by the substantial increase in wheat prices since the end of May. This increase has been in the face of a Department of Agriculture estimate indicating a very large wheat crop in this country this year which was issued on June 8 and normally would have produced a decline in the market. Those who have advocated the stabilization corporation theory have from the beginning claimed its greatest advantage to be psychological. They have said that the bear traders on the speculative markets would not continue to sell short and to press their advantage in a declining market, if it were threatened that a stabilization corporation adequately financed might step into the market and buy actual wheat, but would cover for fear of being caught in a trap. A reading of the press dispatches of the market of the last three weeks will show that this is exactly what happened and largely turned the market from the 96-cent level of May 31 to the $1.15 level in June.

There is, however, a further significant proof. Liverpool wheat always sells above Chicago for the natural reason that at Liverpool the wheat has a heavy freight charge in addition to its cost in the original market. For example, December wheat for the period from August to December, 1928, averaged 17¾ cents higher in Liverpool than in Chicago. It was, of course, perfectly known to traders in both markets that farm-relief legislation could not become effective in time to influence wheat for delivery in December, 1928. On the other hand, during the period from October 1 until the middle of January the average price in Liverpool for wheat for May, 1929, delivery was 12⅞ cents more than in Chicago. This was in part due undoubtedly to the thought that farm-relief legislation might be enacted before the May delivery.

From the middle of January on through March, as the determination of President-elect Hoover to call a special session was made clear and the call actually issued, the difference between Liverpool and Chicago on May delivery was reduced from the 14⅞ cents of January 5 to 5 cents on March 16. Any such difference, of course, is far less than the cost of the delivery of the wheat from Chicago to Liverpool. And, during the debate on farm relief and the uncertainty as to whether any intelligent plan would be adopted, the spread rose again until on May 29, Liverpool was 15⅝ cents higher on July wheat. With the passage of the legislation the differential immediately dropped almost day by day and on June 22 it reached the absurdly low figure of 1½ cents per bushel. This can have been due only to a feeling on the part of the grain trade that the stabilization corporation proposed by President Hoover and contained in the legislation adopted at this session would protect the domestic market against abnormal decline even when the world market was abnormally depressed either through speculation or too great supplies. In other words, the psychological effect claimed for the stabilization corporation idea has been borne out almost completely by the course of prices at Liverpool and Chicago.

On November 10, 1928, a bushel of wheat for delivery on or before December 31 was worth 21⅜ cents less in Chicago than in Liverpool. On June 22, 1929, a bushel of wheat for delivery on or before July 31—an almost identical period of delayed delivery—was worth only 1½ cents less in Chicago than in Liverpool. I do not claim nor mean to claim that no other factors enter into the movement of prices. Indeed, I do not personally believe that any governmental intervention can alone influence or control prices under any conceivable conditions for any long period of time; but I do contend that the action of the world markets in wheat in the last 12 months clearly justifies every claim for the stabilization corporation principle and just as clearly shows the futility or worse of the debenture plan. The advocates of that plan have even without succeeding in its adoption greatly injured the American wheat grower already. A continuance of such advocacy will threaten a repetition at the time of harvest, when the farmers own all the wheat, of a like drastic decline.

I have already talked far longer than I intended and there are still a half dozen more powerful arguments against the debenture plan which I shall not attempt to add. They are splendidly stated in the letter of the President to the Senate committee giving his views on the proposal.

I can not, however, close without appealing to the farmer of America whose sound common sense has been the backbone of our political institutions to reject emphatically being saddled with the added burden of this economic monstrosity. To secure the direful results of the debenture plan the American farmer is asked to concede his independence to become the subsidized hireling of the Government with the rate of his reward determined from year to year by Congress, which in the long run will be controlled by the 70 per cent of the American people who are consumers rather than producers of farm products. I can not believe that the American farmer will sell his birthright as the one remaining independent American producer for any such mess of pottage.

TOLL BRIDGES

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the RECORD of this date will be found a lengthy article by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] entitled "Bridge and Bridge Legislation." The author is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House and handles bills granting the consent of Congress for the construction of bridges, both public and privately owned, over navigable streams.

I have read the article and it seems to me to be another effort to justify the existing policy of Congress in reference to granting permission to construct toll bridges. This policy, in my opinion, is indefensible.

Without the other side of the story some will be inclined to feel, after reading Mr. DENISON'S remarks, that he and his colleagues on the bridge committee are performing a meritorious public service. On the contrary the present policy of Congress in authorizing the construction of privately owned toll bridges while it might be beneficial politically to the Representatives who seek the passage of the bills, is detrimental to the interests of the general public.

In a colloquy I engaged in, the gentleman from Illinois a few days ago admitted the present general bridge act was passed in 1906 and had never been amended since that date. Numerous bills have been introduced both in the House and Senate which sought to improve and bring this law up to date but no action has ever been taken by the committee. Following a storm of protests which threatens the defeat of all privately owned toll bridge bills in the coming session of Congress, Mr. DENISON stated last week, in answer to my question, that he is now preparing a bill to deal specifically with many of the objections advanced against privately owned toll bridges, but judging from his statement, his views are such that one must conclude his bill will fall short of obtaining the objective which some of us have been contending for during the past two years.

FEDERAL AID $100,000,000 A YEAR

The Government, through Federal aid, advances in the neighborhood of $100,000,000 annually for road construction in cooperation with the States. Almost every State has a gas tax and an automobile license tax, the money in most instances going into the highway fund, and it is estimated that nearly $1,000,000,000 a year goes into road construction and maintenance of roads. It will not be many years before the investment in State highways will amount to $50,000,000,000; still Congress, acting under an obsolete law passed in 1906 which has never been amended, permits the construction of toll bridges privately owned, which never would have been suggested had not the State and Federal Governments constructed the highways leading to the point, simply because a Member of Congress introduces a bill. I insist that the interests of the public are not thought of, because the influence of the Representative who offers the bill is alone sufficient to get a toll-bridge franchise. Few bills fail to get a favorable report from the committee, and where the bill fails it is the Representative himself who delays action. He satisfies a community by offering the bill, but protects his political interests in other parts of his district when a protest is offered by delaying action on the measure.

Every unanimous-consent day, which is every second Monday in the House, finds the calendar literally covered with bridge bills.

OPPOSITION NATION-WIDE

The opposition to the construction of toll bridges by private parties is nation-wide.

The professional promoters who have profited by their activities in bringing about the construction of toll bridges, with few exceptions, are not public-spirited citizens. They are in the game for what they can make out of it, and in many instances their operations do not extend beyond that of securing the franchise from Congress and peddling the grant after selling the idea to some construction company. They either receive cash or common stock in the project in return for the consent Congress grants for the construction of the bridge. The consent of Congress to construct a bridge does not cost one penny, and there is absolutely no reason why anyone should pay for the assignment of a franchise. In most instances the original promoter, who probably lives hundreds of miles away from the location of the bridge, not even in the same State, steps out of the picture when he disposes of the franchise.

SEVEN OUT OF TEN FRANCHISES ASSIGNED

Under a clause in the bills passed in the Sixty-ninth and the Seventieth Congresses a report must be filed with the Secretary of War showing the cost of construction, financing, and so forth. Ten such reports have been filed. In 7 out of the 10 cases the grantee assigned the franchise. Only in 2 cases has the cost been approved—the bridge at Neals Landing, Ga., and at Eagle Pass, Tex. At Neals Landing, Ga., the grantee constructed the bridge, which cost $105,911.88, and the financing and promotion charges were only $842.73. A complete analysis has not been made in connection with the other reports, but it is interesting to note the cost of financing and promotion of some of the other projects. A new bridge was constructed at Norfolk, Va.; cost of construction, $799,298.12; cost of financing and promotion, $218,550.69, or over 25 per cent for financing and promotion, while at Mason, W. Va., a bridge cost $711,102.84 to construct, and the promotion and financing cost was $65,527.89. At Steubenville, Ohio, the new bridge cost $894,890.12 and the financing and promotion charges were $76,322.57. The bridge at Cape Girardeau, Mo., total cost, $1,587,614.40, including real property, not analyzed as to construction cost, showed $144,328.58 for financing and promotion. The bridge at Louisiana, Mo., showed a total cost of $901,876.21, while the financing and promotion cost was $92,500.

The return on the bridges constructed across the Mississippi River at Alton, Ill., and across the Missouri River near that point shows the cost of the two structures to be $2,236,177.41. The original franchises were granted to Alfred L. McCauley, who assigned them to the Alton-St. Louis Bridge Co. This report has not been analyzed, and therefore the cost of construction, cost of real property, and promoting and financing charges are not available.

When the figures submitted are finally analyzed information will be available as to just how much it costs to finance and promote all bridges constructed since the new paragraph has been inserted in the bills.

It will also be interesting to see what action the War Department takes in reaching the approved cost when the promotion and financing cost exceeds 10 per cent. There is quite a difference between the bridge at Neals Landing, Ga., which shows a financing and promotion cost of less than 1 per cent, and the bridge at Norfolk, showing a financing and promotion cost of over 25 per cent. Official information of this character will be valuable to present to the House when the bridge legislation is under consideration. In the end it will now also be possible to secure official information as to whether a project was overfinanced. Probably the fact that the bridge showing a promotion and financing cost of less than 1 per cent was constructed by the grantee had something to do with this item, while in the case of the bridge constructed at Norfolk, with financing and promotion charges above 25 per cent, the grantee assigned the franchise.

TWO OUTSTANDING EXAMPLES

Two outstanding examples which show conclusively that enormous sums are realized out of toll bridges are the bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo., and the bridge over the Susquehanna River at Havre de Grace, Md.

The St. Charles bridge was purchased by local communities and the St. Charles Free Bridge Committee is in charge, with Judge Sam D. Hodgdon, of Clayton, Mo., as chairman. The bridge was taken over in August, 1926. The report issued January 1, 1929, showed $623,308.66 has been applied to the principal. They have paid over half of the purchasing price and expect before the end of 1930 to pay the remainder. The bridge will then be donated to the State of Missouri, which means that these public-spirited citizens will be giving their State practically $1,250,000. When the bridge is presented to the State it will become a free bridge.

The bridge at Havre de Grace was purchased by the State of Maryland for $500,000. It was a one-way bridge and an upper deck was erected providing for traffic in both directions at the same time. This bridge, where the toll, like the St. Charles bridge, was less than 50 cents for an ordinary automobile, collected sufficient tolls in three years to clear the investment, including the cost of the upper deck.

Another case that might be mentioned is the Holland vehicular tunnels, the property of New York and New Jersey, costing $48,400,000, opened to the public in November, 1927, connecting New York City with New Jersey. Fifty cents is charged to drive your automobile under the Hudson River. The receipts now amount to over $400,000 per month, or around $5,000,000 a year. Thus it will be seen the tunnel will be paid for in 10 years and will then be free to the public.

JURISDICTION OVER THE BRIDGES

The statement is made in the article by Mr. Denison that the provisions of the act of March 3, 1899, by which Congress allowed bridges over navigable waters, the navigable portions of which were wholly within one State, to be built with the approval of the State, should be repealed, for the alleged reason that the State legislatures have not heretofore and do not now fully protect the interests of the public. The statement also is made that Congress has for some years inserted limitations and provisions in bridge franchises which so protect the public from exploitation and imposition that shrewd business men who wish to avoid these conditions and restrictions prefer to construct bridges under State laws where the navigable portion of the water to be bridged lies wholly within a single State.

As to the foregoing statement, there are very few instances of bridges across navigable waters, even where the navigable portion of such waters lies wholly within a single State, having been authorized under State legislation rather than congressional franchise. An outstanding instance of a private toll bridge built under State authorization rather than congressional authorization is that of the Lake Pontchartrain bridge in New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and this one has been a complete financial failure and is now in the hands of a receiver. Five million dollars in securities were issued by the promoters. So far as protecting the navigability of waters is concerned, however, that is safeguarded equally as well in the case of a bridge built under State authority, as it is in the case of one built under congressional authorization, because in both instances the location, plans, and specifications have to be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. It is the approval by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War that safeguards navigation, and not the fact that the authority for the construction of the bridge is granted by the State rather than by Congress, or vice versa.

GENERAL BRIDGE LEGISLATION

The last three paragraphs under this heading in the second column, page 3246, refer to a question being asked as to why the time of Congress should be taken up with the consideration of bridge bills and why should not Congress delegate to some responsible Government agency the duty of passing and consenting upon the construction of bridges. Then there is suggested the answer that it is because it is one of the most important functions of the Federal Government not only to guard and preserve our navigable waters in the interests of commerce but to improve them.

If the object desired to be accomplished is to preserve and safeguard from obstructions all of our navigable waters in the interests of commerce, that certainly can be accomplished without the necessity of the time of Congress being taken up with the consideration of bridge bills. The only safeguard under the plan whereby Congress passes upon bridge bills is the action by the Chief of Engineers and Secretary of War in the consideration given and requirements made before approving the plans and location. This is done by these Federal officials just as efficiently in the case of bridges built under State authorization as it is for those built under bills especially considered and enacted by Congress. In other words, it is not the fact that these bridge bills are considered and consume so much time of Congress that preserves and safeguards our navigable waters, but the action of the Federal officials in the War Department to whom Congress has delegated the power and given the duty of passing upon the location and plans.

WATERWAYS, THE NATION'S NATURAL HIGHWAYS

This subheading seems to emphasize over and over again the safeguarding of navigable waters, in the interest of which the suggestion is made that no bridges or other structures be authorized over such waters except under the most careful and guarded regulations and restrictions. Navigation is on the water and not on or over the bridges. The safeguarding of the waters in the interests of navigation is intrusted entirely to the War Department at the present time, and, so far as that is concerned, Congress could very well be relieved of the consideration of the several hundred bridge bills which are mentioned as being introduced each session of Congress.

The investment banker referred to as having testified before the House committee five or six years ago as to the hazardous character of bridge securities and later having testified before the same committee as to the changed and presently acceptable nature of such securities properly attributes this change to the construction of concrete highways and the growth of the automobile industry, but who builds these concrete highways and who owns and operates these automobiles? Obviously, the public. Both the toll bridges and the automobiles would be more or less useless without the concrete highways, and the latter are built exclusively at the cost and expense of the public.

TOLL BRIDGES

The last two paragraphs on page 3247, first column, make the statement that bridges are parts of our highway systems or not, depending upon the location of the bridges. A distinction is undertaken to be drawn between intrastate and interstate bridges and between interstate bridges over small streams and such bridges over large streams, the latter being declared not to be parts of the highways.

The Federal highway act defines the term "highway" as follows:

> The term "highway" includes rights of way, bridges, drainage structures, signs, guard rails, and protective structures in connection with highways * * *.

The Federal highway act further provides in section 6 for a system of Federal-aid highways which shall be interstate in character and restricts the expenditure of all Federal-aid apportionments to highways on this system. Bridges of the kind referred to under this subheading of the articles certainly are parts of the highways where located on the system of Federal-aid highways whether across a boundary stream, large or small, or across a steam wholly within one State.

On page 3247 reference is made to some people advocating the construction of expensive bridges over arms of the sea by the Federal Government. There has been no serious advocacy of such bridges being constructed by the Federal Government. In fact, if such policy has been advocated at all it has been by such a hopeless few in point of numbers and influence that it does not deserve to be given mention.

PRIVATELY OWNED TOLL BRIDGES

Reference is here made to privately owned toll bridges as being like privately owned electric-light plants, gas plants, water plants, and street-car systems. In other words, that they are public utilities privately owned, and much is made of the provision in the act of March 23, 1906, under which the rates of toll must be reasonable and just and must be regulated by the War Department. An effort is made under this subheading to class those who are opposed to private toll bridges with those who favor public ownership of public utilities such as electric light, water, and gas plants and street-car systems. Such a comparison is absurd.

I fail to find where any responsible official of the Bureau of Public Roads holds any such view as is charged in the seventh paragraph on page 3248, first column, concerning ownership of public utilities. They are opposed to private toll bridges which are valuable only because of the improvements made upon the public highways at public expense, but as to public ownership such as is advocated by what is known as the public-ownership advocates I am unable to confirm the statement contained in the article. The statement is made that in some States constitutional limitations prevent the public borrowing of money for the construction of bridges and that in such States the highway commissions are urged to borrow money from private bankers to construct toll bridges and secure the loans by pledges of the tolls without pledging the credit of the States.

The statement alleges that those who entertain these views would resort to any device to bring about the construction of all bridges by public authorities and even operate them as toll bridges rather than to permit their construction and operation by private capital. It would appear to be a crime for a bridge to be constructed by public authorities and operated as a toll bridge. One would infer that the borrowing of money from private bankers on the security of the tolls would be a most reprehensible device which States are being urged to resort to in order to circumvent legal and constitutional limitations which hamper them in building bridges. This so-called device, which properly may be referred to as the revenue bonds, is recognized by some of the leading banking houses of the country as a sound basis for financing bridge structures. The several bridges across the Hudson and other rivers being built by the Port of New York Authority are being financed by this method. Seven States of the Union have recently passed legislation providing for the acquisition or construction of bridges under this plan of financing. It therefore is a device which is being used to a very great extent and it takes no special urging on anyone's part for it to be adopted in responsible and well-informed circles.

The gasoline tax and the automobile license fees, most of which go into the highway funds of the States, are referred to as tolls. These taxes are not tolls in the proper sense of the word. This statement finds support by decisions of the Federal courts in four cases which came up from the States of Oregon and Washington, in which the contention was made that the gasoline taxes and the automobile license fees could properly be regarded as tolls for the use of the highways within the meaning of that term as used in section 9 of the Federal highway act and section 1 of the original Federal aid act of July 11, 1916. The Washington cases mentioned were Cunningham et al. against Potts, State Treasurer, reported in Ninth Federal (2d) 469, involving the question as applying to the automobile tax law, and Nelson et al. against Potts, involving the gasoline tax law.

The two Oregon cases were Anthony et al. v. Kozer, Secretary of State (11 Fed. (2d) 641), involving the gasoline tax law, and Martine et al. v. Kozer, Secretary of State (11 Fed. (2d) 645), involving the motor vehicle license tax. These cases raised identically the same points in the two States and the plaintiffs were represented by the same firm of attorneys. Petitions were filed in the lower Federal courts for injunctions to restrain the collection of these taxes on the ground, among other things, that they constitute tolls on the highway in violation of the inhibition against tolls in the Federal-aid legislation. The injunctions were denied by the district court in both cases in both States. They finally reached the United States Supreme Court on appeal, which court dismissed all four cases for want of jurisdiction. One paragraph in the decision of the Federal district court in the Anthony case, which is the same position taken in the other three cases, reads as follows:

> No doubt the Congress had in mind, in adopting the clause, "All highways constructed or reconstructed under the provisions of this act shall be free from tolls of all kinds," the many toll roads of the country that were in years previous constructed through grants of public lands and bounties appropriated by the General Government, and on which, for the privilege of passage, the proprietors were permitted to exact tolls, and it was adopted as a policy that no tolls of any kind should be exacted for the privilege of passage over the rural post roads for the construction of which the Government was to appropriate its public funds. Such is obviously the intendment of the acts of Congress in extending aid to the States for construction and maintenance of their roads and highways. The excise tax here provided for has no relation to the tolls inhibited by the acts of Congress, and is therefore not to be condemned as such.

POLICY OF CONGRESS TOWARD TOLL BRIDGES

What is declared to be the policy of Congress is outlined as being, first, to encourage the construction of highway bridges by public authorities whenever it can be done, and unless the bridge committee is convinced that the bridge can not or will not be constructed by public authority the franchise will not be granted for private construction. In this connection it would be interesting to know why the State of Indiana was held up for so long a period in 1928 in getting consideration of a bill under which it desired a permit to construct a bridge across the Ohio River at Evansville. At that time a bill to authorize a private concern to construct a bridge at this point was pending. It is interesting also in this connection to note that the State of Kentucky, which entered into an agreement with the State of Indiana for the construction of a bridge over the Ohio River at Evansville, has found it necessary to appeal to the United States Supreme Court in order to try to clear the way for the two States to build the proposed bridge, since Indiana finds its hands tied by injunctive orders issued by the courts of that State at the ostensible instance of certain citizens but in fact at the instance of the private interests, who were granted an authorization to build a bridge at this point at the same time the State was granted such authority.

Reference is made to the public's interests being so well safeguarded by the right of condemnation conferred upon the States in the bridge bills as now passed. The State could condemn these without the special authorization in the congressional enactments, and the only feature of this of special interest is that after the elapse of a certain time the amount of damages or compensation is limited. This period is usually 20 years or more, regardless of the size of the bridge. The statement is made in the article that the measure of damages is limited at any time after the expiration of 5, 10, or 15 years, depending on the location and size of the bridge. It would be a reasonable statement to say that not 1 per cent of the private toll bridges authorized have less than a 20-year period stipulated in them before the limited damages or compensation provision becomes operative.

PROTECTION AGAINST ABUSES OF TOLL FRANCHISES

There is no adequate protection afforded under the present form of bridge bills against the dishonest or fraudulent padding of costs. There is no public highway authority which is given any authority as to the location, plans, specifications, type, and cost of any privately authorized toll bridge in the regular forms for bridge bills now being used. A private toll bridge being constructed across the Colorado River near Blythe, Calif., collapsed after it was almost completed. The reference is made to a number of bridges which are being constructed across the Ohio River, and the statement is made that none of them could or would be constructed by the States with which they connect. The States of Kentucky and Missouri have both made provision for constructing interstate as well as intrastate bridges. The same is true of the States of Tennessee and Arkansas, and between the last-named States there is now under construction a viaduct at the crossing of the Mississippi River at Memphis, which when completed will be over 2 miles long and will cost about $1,500,000. A tremendous fight was staged by the private toll-bridge interests to prevent this improvement at the Memphis crossing of the Mississippi River as a public proposition in order that it might be converted into a private toll bridge. It soon will be constructed, however, and by the time that it is completed the tolls on the old viaduct which it replaces will have paid the entire cost of the improvement to the State of Arkansas and the new viaduct will be toll free.

COST OF TOLL BRIDGES

The statement is made that the Government bureaus could not construct bridges more efficiently or more economically than private business concerns "if the business concerns are in control of honest management." It is noted that all the way through the statement under this subheading appears the qualifying language with reference to private business concerns "assuming that they are honestly managed" or some similar phrase.

It will be conceded that private concerns if honestly managed ought to be able to build bridges as cheaply as public authorities if they build the same type of bridge. One difference in the construction of the bridges by public authorities and private interests is that the public authorities usually construct a much better type of bridge than the private interests, the latter being interested in something which will carry the traffic at the least cost and produce immediate revenue. The trouble, however, is that the cost in the case of bridges privately constructed are loaded down with financing charges and other charges of one kind or another, frequently the contract being privately let to a concern composed of officials of the bridge company at an exorbitant price.

If the present bridge policy of Congress was sound, it certainly would not be necessary for such sanctimonious statements to be issued in its defense.

It took 150 years to eliminate the tollgate, and if Congress does not discontinue the present stupid policy of authorizing privately owned toll bridges, it will take as many more to eliminate the toll bridges.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has, in my opinion, failed to make his case.

(Since preparing the above statement I have learned settlement has just been made by the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey for two toll bridges across the Delaware River which are to be thrown open to the public. The bridges crossing from Milford, N. J., to Upper Black Eddy, Pa., and from Frenchtown, N. J., to Uhlerstown, Pa., date back as toll bridges to Revolutionary days. They were purchased by the Interstate Bridge Commission of New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Community celebrations to mark the passing of toll collections are scheduled.

Purchase of the two bridges leaves only three spans across the Delaware on which tolls are collected, and negotiations are under way to purchase these. In recent years New Jersey and Pennsylvania, acting jointly, have acquired 14 toll bridges over the Delaware and they are now free bridges. This clearly indicates what the States are doing to eliminate toll bridges, but under the present policy of Congress if a private-toll-bridge promoter asks for a franchise to construct a toll bridge over the Delaware River he can get it for the asking. Is this fair to the people of these States who are trying to purchase all existing toll bridges?)

BRANCH BANKING

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I desire to call attention to a matter of great importance.

The banks in the smaller cities and towns of the United States should begin now to combat a movement which threatens their existence.

A drive is now on by a powerful group to secure legislation giving nation-wide branch-banking power to national banks.

Ultimately this would mean the elimination of all banks except those in the larger cities. Banks in other places would become mere branches of a large chain system; they would be owned, operated, and controlled by capitalists living in distant cities, the profits instead of being distributed and invested in the communities where made would go elsewhere, the only employees in these branch banks would be a clerical and subordinate force with no power to make loans except on orders from some executive officer in a distant city. What the chain system of stores has meant in reducing the wealth of communities and concentrating it in the cities would be infinitely worse in chain banking. Branch banking means chain banking; that is its logical result, and that is what is desired by its advocates.

When Congress passed the McFadden bill in 1927, which gave a limited right of branch banking to certain banks in some cities where competing State banks had such right, there were those of us who voted against the bill on the ground that it was the opening wedge and that the next step would be to give this power generally to all banks everywhere. We so charged in the debate on the bill, but the proponents of the bill vigorously denied that such was contemplated or would ever be done, and declared that if such attempt was made they would oppose it; but now, within less than two years, our prophecy is being fulfilled, and the ardent champions of that bill have thrown off the mask and now declare that it was "an emergency measure," and a "permanent measure" should be passed giving this right to all banks everywhere.

The ultimate and final effect of branch banking means the elimination of unit banks and the ownership of all banks by a few small groups. Monopoly, always dangerous, is fraught with extraordinary hazard when applied to the business of banking, which controls the credit of the country. Such a monopoly could and would dominate and control all business, it could mold and shape the politics of the country, and even the Federal Government would in time be subservient to the autocratic will of this supermonopoly.

The entire citizenship of the country should be interested in averting this threatened menace.

ARKANSAS SOLDIERS BURIED IN OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given by the House to extend remarks in the RECORD I am including a list prepared by the Quartermaster General showing the names, organizations, and grave locations of those heroic sons of Arkansas who gave their lives for their country during the World War and now lie buried in permanent American cemeteries in Europe.

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764. Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

COLORADO SOLDIERS BURIED IN OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to pay tribute to the part played in the World War by the soldiers and sailors of the State of Colorado, by making a matter of public record the list of the heroic Colorado boys who sacrificed their lives on the altar of liberty during that conflict, and who now are buried in the permanent American cemeteries of Europe.

The list is as follows:

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764. Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

No. 34. Suresnes American Cemetery, Suresnes, Seine (near Paris).

No. 636. Somme American Cemetery, Bony, Aisne.

No. 608. Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, Seringes-et-Nesles, Aisne.

No. 1233. St. Mihiel American Cemetery, Thiaucourt, Meurthe-et-Moselle.

BELGIUM

No. 1252. Flanders Field American Cemetery, Waereghem, Belgium.

ENGLAND

No. 107–E. Brookwood American Cemetery, Brookwood (near London), England.

INDIANA SOLDIERS BURIED IN OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, 421 sons of Indiana who gave the last full measure of devotion during the World War are sleeping overseas. Their well-marked graves will be as many shrines to attract the love and homage of a grateful commonwealth through all the years to come. Their lives were Indiana's precious offering on the altar of civilization, and it is my privilege as a Representative of the State that gave them to the service of mankind to insert their names and burial places in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to establish a permanent record that will be of value not only to the relatives of these men but to all of the people of our State and to friends of humanity everywhere, who hold them in loving memory.

The list is as follows:

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

NEBRASKA SOLDIERS BURIED IN OVERSEAS CEMETERIES

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, words will not express the love, loyalty, and honor that America has for those citizens who served in her hour of need on the battle fields of the world. Nebraska pays deepest honor to the memory of those men, citizens of our State, who sleep in the American cemeteries of Europe. In order that the permanent list may be made public, I present herewith for extension in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the names, organizations, and grave locations of the members of the American forces enlisted from the State of Nebraska, as prepared by the Quartermaster General of the Army.

DECEASED SOLDIERS FROM NORTH DAKOTA BURIED IN PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me by the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to pay tribute to the part played in the World War by the soldiers and sailors of the State of North Dakota, by making a matter of public record the list of the heroic North Dakota boys who sacrificed their lives on the altar of liberty during that conflict, and who now are buried in the permanent American cemeteries of Europe.

The list is as follows:

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Orgonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764. Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

DECEASED SOLDIERS FROM NEVADA BURIED IN PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given by the House to extend remarks in the RECORD, I desire to pay tribute to the part played in the World War by the soldiers and sailors of the State of Nevada by making a matter of public record the list of the heroic Nevada boys who sacrificed their lives on the altar of liberty during that conflict, and who now are buried in the permanent American cemeteries of Europe.

The list is as follows:

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764. Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

No. 34. Suresnes American Cemetery, Suresnes, Seine (near Paris).

No. 636. Somme American Cemetery, Bony, Aisne.

No. 608. Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, Seringes-et-Nesles, Aisne.

No. 1233. St. Mihiel American Cemetery, Thiaucourt, Meurthe-et-Moselle.

BELGIUM

No. 1252. Flanders Field American Cemetery, Waereghem, Belgium.

ENGLAND

No. 107–E. Brookwood American Cemetery, Brookwood (near London), England.

DECEASED SOLDIERS FROM TENNESSEE BURIED IN PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given by the House to extend remarks in the RECORD I desire to pay tribute to the part played in the World War by the soldiers and sailors of the State of Tennessee by making a matter of public record the list of the heroic Tennessee boys who sacrificed their lives on the altar of liberty during that conflict, and who now are buried in the permanent American cemeteries of Europe.

The list is as follows:

KEY TO PERMANENT AMERICAN CEMETERIES IN EUROPE

FRANCE

No. 1232. Meuse-Argonne American Cemetery, Romagne-sous-Montfaucon, Meuse.

No. 1764. Aisne-Marne American Cemetery, Belleau, Aisne.

No. 34. Suresnes American Cemetery, Suresnes, Seine (near Paris).

No. 636. Somme American Cemetery, Bony, Aisne.

No. 608. Oise-Aisne American Cemetery, Seringes-et-Nesles, Aisne.

No. 1233. St. Mihiel American Cemetery, Thiaucourt, Meurthe-et-Moselle.

BELGIUM

No. 1252. Flanders Field American Cemetery, Waereghem, Belgium.

ENGLAND

No. 107–E. Brookwood American Cemetery, Brookwood (near London), England.

CHARLES CURTIS, of Kansas, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. God of our Fathers, God of our Nation, our God, Thou art the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Thou hast ever been shaping and guiding the destiny of men and of nations. As Thou hast led Thy children in times past, so lead them even now with Thy wisdom. Let Thy favor rest upon these Thy servants, chosen leaders of a great people, filling their minds and hearts with noble ideals, that they may walk worthy of their high calling. Open eyes to behold Thy glory, open minds to receive Thy wisdom, open hearts to accept Thy love, and impart strength to do Thy will.

Let Thy favor also rest upon the President and all his advisers. Quicken every impulse which makes for wise statesmanship, to the end that righteousness, peace, and prosperity may reign throughout our land and in all the world, to Thy name's honor and glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk (John C. Crockett) proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, June 19, 1929, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading of the Journal was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until next Thursday, August 22, 1929, at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, August 22, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

THURSDAY, August 22, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Gracious God, source of all life, inspiration of all love, mercy, justice, and truth, we wait upon Thee for a divine touch that our lives may promote Thy kingdom on earth. Ever mindful of Thy goodness, teach us to be ever mindful of Thy sternness. Unto us Thou hast given a great heritage, and upon us also Thou hast placed a great responsibility. As Thou hast reposed confidence in us so may we put our trust in Thee. Thus trusting Thee we shall serve Thee, and serving Thee we shall serve Thy people, to the end that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will may be done on earth, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 26, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian,

SENATE

MONDAY, August 26, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Everliving God, to whom we are indebted for life and all things that surround our lives, quicken, we pray Thee, all that is pure, noble, and best in us, casting out all things that are evil. Lift before our eyes a vision of the strength and beauty of the King of men, and give us might of will to follow Him.

For the life and service of an esteemed Member of this body whom Thou hast taken unto Thyself we give Thee thanks. May Thy blessing rest upon those whose eyes are dimmed with tears at the parting. Teach them that Thou art ever nearest when Thy children need Thee most, and that Thou dost walk with them even through the valley of the shadow of death. Keep us all within Thy watchful care, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next, August 28, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEATH OF SENATOR LAWRENCE D. TYSON

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am deeply grieved to announce the death of my colleague, Senator TYSON, of Tennessee, on last Saturday early in the morning.

Senator TYSON was not only a great statesman but as well a great soldier. He was educated at West Point, took a distinguished part in the Spanish-American War as colonel of a regiment, and when his country became involved in the World War he entered that great conflict as a brigadier general, and his command was one of the first to cross the Hindenburg line.

In addition to his outstanding qualities as a statesman and soldier, my colleague was noted for his wonderful, delightful, and attractive personality. He was in deed and in fact a gentleman of the old school, and one of the most lovable men I ever knew. He was greatly beloved not only in Tennessee but wherever he was known, especially by his associates in the Senate, where I believe all Senators were his friends.

At a later day I will ask that a time be set when appropriate exercises may be held in tribute to his memory. For the present I offer the following resolutions, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read by the Chief Clerk.

The resolutions (S. Res. 104) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. LAWRENCE D. TYSON, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of Mr. TYSON.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee under the second resolution the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of my late distinguished colleague, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Wednesday, August 28, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, August 28, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Infinite and Gracious God, our Heavenly Father, draw us by Thy holy influence into a finer and more noble realm of thought and action. Inspire us to work with Thee for the things which lead to righteousness, truth, justice, and good will among men. May the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, rest upon us and be the portion of all mankind. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO SATURDAY

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Saturday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Saturday, August 31, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

SATURDAY, August 31, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington. offered the following prayer:

Unto Thee do we lift thankful hands, O Lord, our God, for such measure of liberty, and of justice, and of peace as has been attained in our beloved land. We pray that Thy guiding hand shalt be felt by the appointed leaders of this people, the President and Members of this body, the President of the United States, and all associated with him in authority, that through Thy guidance a truer liberty, a finer justice, and a more enduring peace may be attained. And to Thy name shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Wednesday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Wednesday, September 4, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, September 4, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, we pause amidst the busy rush of life's many duties to think of Thee. Purify Thou our thoughts, make wise our speech, ennoble our acts that in all that we are we may honor Thee. So touch the hearts of all who hold positions of influence and authority in our beloved land that pure and wise and noble they may be. Let Thy blessing descend in full measure upon us now that all the resolves and enactments of this day may be well pleasing in Thy sight, and to Thee will we ascribe all praise. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the executive and disbursing officer of the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission relative to the approval of award of contracts for granite for the water gate and parkway approach to the Arlington Memorial Bridge, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MEXICAN IMMIGRATION

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I send to the desk a speech delivered by Mr. John Farr Simmons, chief of the visa office of the State Department, delivered at Williamstown, Mass., at a conference on immigration. It relates to Mexican immigration. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

There being no objection, the speech was referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH OF JOHN FARR SIMMONS, CHIEF OF VISA OFFICE, STATE DEPARTMENT, AT WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS., CONFERENCE ON IMMIGRATION

The previous speaker has dealt in a most illuminating way upon the economic aspects of our postwar immigration from Mexico and has told you of what the Mexican does after arriving in this country. It is my purpose to deal with the question of Mexican immigration to this country more from the point of view of our international relations and in connection with the general question of restrictive immigration legislation.

Before entering into this phase of the question, however, I think it wise to point out a difficulty which would be encountered in effecting the plan proposed by the preceding speaker, Mr. Fitzpatrick, of regulating immigration with various individual countries by means of separate treaties or agreements.

The authority to regulate immigration into the United States has always rested exclusively with Congress. The plan proposed would, of course, delegate a certain amount of the authority to regulate immigration into the United States to its executive rather than its legislative branch. A second and possibly a more generally recognized difficulty would lie in the fact that immigration has come to be regarded in this country as a purely domestic concern. Any arrangement to regulate immigration by mutual agreements with foreign countries would doubtless give rise to very widespread objection on the part of the large body of people in the United States who consider that immigration problems, as they increase in importance, should remain even more than previously a domestic matter.

Those of you who have followed recent immigration developments closely are doubtless aware that the Secretary of State, in a statement made before the Senate Committee on Immigration on March 5, 1928, presented evidence to show that the application of quotas to the American countries would be attended by serious injury to our relations with those countries and to important business interests of the United States abroad.

Reports requested from American diplomatic representatives in Latin-American countries are practically unanimous in their statement that the application of quota restrictions to them could not fail to be interpreted by them as a radical departure from the traditional policy of this country toward Latin America, and as evidence of unwillingness to continue to regard them as equals and neighbors having common problems, interests, and aims.

While it is urged that these important considerations be given due weight, it is nevertheless recognized that they would not in themselves be sufficient to prevent the extension of quota restrictions to the countries of this hemisphere if it should be conclusively established that the need for such a measure is so great as to outweigh its disadvantages.

In questioning the wisdom of adopting legislation to that end at the present time, I wish to make it clear that there is no advocacy of the free admission of large numbers of aliens of any nationality to the injury of the best interests of the United States. It would seem logical, however, that before any particular measure having serious disadvantages is adopted, full information should be available as to the nature and extent of the problem which it is designed to correct; careful consideration should be given to whether the proposed legislation would effect the desired result if passed, and an endeavor should be made to find, if possible, other means of attaining the same object which would involve less injury to legitimate interests of the United States.

With respect to immigration from American countries other than Mexico no serious problem exists. Immigration from all the other Latin-American countries is so small as to be negligible, averaging slightly more than 7,000 during the past three years, of which an average of approximately 2,000 were natives of Cuba. As to Canada, while statistics show a considerable annual immigration, the number of emigrants from the United States to Canada is so great that the exchange of people intending to take up their residence in the other country is virtually equal.

The only serious problem, therefore, is that of immigration from Mexico, and it is recognized that this problem is one which would seem to require immediate attention. In order to indicate the extent of the problem the following figures are given showing the Mexican-born population and total foreign-born population in the United States, 1900 to 1920, according to United States census statistics:

Year	Mexican	Total	Per cent
1920	486,418	13,920,692	3.5
1910	221,915	13,515,886	1.6
1900	103,393	10,341,276	1.0

The following table shows (1) the number of Mexican citizens departing from the United States according to the Mexican migration service statistics, (2) the number of persons of the Mexican race recorded by the American immigration authorities as entering the United States for permanent residence, and (3) the number of Mexican citizens returning to Mexico from the United States according to the figures of the Mexican Government:

	Mexicans entering United States (figures Mexican migration service for calendar years)	Mexicans admitted fiscal years ended June 30 (Department of Labor Statistics)	Mexicans returning from United States (figures Mexican migration service for calendar years)
Total for years 1910–1919, inclusive	298,266	173,663	387,486
Total for years 1920–1927, inclusive	402,037	391,030	625,536

NOTE.—The Department of Labor does not have complete figures for returning Mexicans.

From the above table it will be noted that the number of Mexicans reported as returning to Mexico exceeds those recorded as entering the United States, both for the decade 1910 to 1919 and the period 1920 to 1927. There was a material difference between the Mexican and American figures covering the immigration of Mexicans into the United States from 1910 to 1919, but there is substantial agreement in the statistics of the two Governments during the 8-year period from 1920 to 1927, there being a divergence of less than 3 per cent between the totals. Since the Mexican figures covering departures for the United States during the period last mentioned would appear to be quite accurate, the total of 625,536 given by that authority as the number of Mexicans returning to Mexico during the same period would seem to merit some credence.

The Mexican-born population of the United States, however, is shown by the above census figures to have actually increased from 221,915 in 1910 to 486,418 in 1920, an increase of 264,503, or 119.2 per cent, in 10 years. The fact that the available migration statistics for the same period show that more Mexicans were recorded as returning to Mexico than as entering this country would indicate, even with generous allowance being made for inaccuracies in the statistics, that the net gain in the Mexican population resulted mainly from irregular entries, such as crossing the border surreptitiously and gaining admission ostensibly for a temporary stay, but failing to return.

As long as the above situation obtains it would seem to be premature to impose quota restrictions on Mexico. Under present conditions such a measure would probably only serve to swell the stream of unlawful entrants, while all of the ill effects of quota legislation would be fully realized. It is understood that the border patrol of the Immigration Service apprehended 10,686 aliens attempting unlawful entry over the Mexican border during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1927, and 15,120 aliens during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928.

It would seem advisable, before furnishing additional and greater incentive to enter unlawfully, to take further measures to make the border control effective and to await the results of the intensive campaign to apprehend and deport Mexicans unlawfully in the United States, which is being undertaken on the basis of the deportation act of March 4, 1929.

The immigration act of 1924 made consular officers abroad responsible in the first instance for passing on the admissibility of all immigrants, including natives of Mexico, in connection with the issuance of the required immigration visa. In making its investigation as to the need for and probable effect of the extension of the quota system to American countries it has been ascertained that the standards of admissibility under the immigration act of February 5, 1917, which have been observed by consular officers in Mexico have been materially lower than those observed by consular officers elsewhere, notably in Europe.

It appears that the condition described has not been due to any deliberate failure on the part of consular officers in Mexico to give full effect to the law, but rather to an entirely different conception of what the law required. This seems to have been brought about by the nature and volume of immigration from that country. The requirements on the Mexican border were apparently relaxed somewhat during the war, when labor was badly needed. Without doubt Mexican labor was also needed in the border States in the postwar period, and everything possible appears to have been done to facilitate its entry. Accordingly precedents were established by immigration officers, and later followed by consular officers, in discharging their new responsibilities under the immigration act of 1924, which led to the recent apparent divergence in the standards applied in Mexico and those observed elsewhere. The method of dealing with Mexican immigration, however, was a matter of natural development influenced by conditions on both sides of the border.

As soon as it was definitely ascertained that the practice in Mexico was below the standard of the service, immediate steps were taken to rectify the situation. Appropriate instructions were issued in August, 1928, to the supervising consul general at Mexico City and energetic measures were taken to effect the result desired. Consular officers in Mexico were urged in particular to refuse immigration visas to Mexicans who could not definitely establish their admissibility under the restrictive clauses concerning illiteracy, contract labor, and likelihood to become public charges.

If the surreptitious entry of Mexicans on a large scale should be stopped by adequate measures, it is believed that the volume of immigration from Mexico can and will be reduced by a proper enforcement of existing law to proportions that will not represent any danger to this country. The results obtained as a result of the instructions to the consul general in Mexico City and of a conference of consular officers held in February in Mexico City, will best be reflected in the statistics of immigration visas issued to natives of Mexico during recent months.

The following tables show comparative figures for the total number of immigration visas issued to natives of Mexico during the periods indicated:

	1927–28	1928–29
March	6,081	1,825
April	6,334	2,548
May	5,001	2,856
June	4,393	2,214
July	4,883	1,950
Total	[1] 26,692	11,393

[1] 57 per cent decrease.

It is expected that further figures received from month to month will continue to show very drastic reductions. These reductions are significant not only since they show a numerical decrease of large proportions but also since they connote a higher degree of selection and the elimination of the very types of peon labor who fail to meet the immigration requirements.

It is believed, in short, that the extension of quota restrictions to the countries of this hemisphere would involve serious disadvantages to the interests of the United States and that that measure should only be adopted as a last resort.

At the present time it is not known what increase there has been in the Mexican population of the United States since the last census, nor what proportion of such increase as there may have been has been due to immigration, temporary visitors who have failed to depart, and aliens who entered surreptitiously. Such statistics as are available indicate that any net gain has resulted largely from irregular entries rather than from immigration. Moreover it is believed that the Government already has on the statute books provisions of law which if properly enforced will provide a means of coping with the situation without resorting to quota restrictions.

Before reversing the policy which has been consistently followed by the United States in enacting its immigration legislation and which has been continued by section 4 (c) of the immigration act of 1924, it is believed that the following steps would be advisable:

1. That means be provided for making an accurate count of Mexicans entering and leaving the United States by categories in order that it may be determined whether the net immigration into this country is such as to require quota restrictions.

2. That all possible measures be taken to make the border control effective and to make possible the deportation of Mexicans remaining in this country unlawfully.

3. That further results be awaited of the department's program for making the enforcement of the immigration laws by consular officers in Mexico fully effective.

In conclusion, it is opportune to point out, with respect to restrictive immigration in general, that the various quota acts culminating in the immigration act of 1924, while very restrictive in character, would not in themselves be capable of attaining the degree of restriction evidently desired by the majority of the American people were it not for their effective enforcement by the administrative officers charged therewith.

In general, it may be said that there is an estimated demand against the quotas of approximately 2,000,000 people, of which about 75 per cent is against the quotas for southern and eastern Europe, which total approximately 24,000.

Many of these intending immigrants, who are unable to accomplish their immigration under the quota, cast about for some other means of effecting their entry into the United States and attempt such entry by applying for nonimmigrant visas as temporary visitors.

To cope with this situation and insure an effective enforcement of the restrictive features of the law it was provided in the regulations issued jointly by the Departments of State and Labor, under the authority of the immigration act of 1924 that a "temporary visitor" shall be construed to mean "an alien who, having a fixed domicile in some other country which he has no intention to abandon, comes to the United States to remain for a temporary period only."

Consular officers abroad in dealing with the above type of cases have a constant and irritating problem before them. They have, nevertheless, succeeded in keeping down the volume of temporary visitors' visas to bona fide cases and have succeeded in preventing what otherwise would have been a very widespread evasion of the immigration laws and a situation which might, if unchecked, have led to a virtual nullification of the restrictive features of the immigration act of 1924.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce:

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY,
STATEHOUSE, TRENTON, N. J.

Assembly concurrent resolution. Introduced and adopted by the house of assembly, April 24, 1929

Whereas application will be made to Congress of the United States for permission to construct a bridge across the Delaware River at a point near Pennsgrove, N. J., and Wilmington, Del., suitable to the interests of navigation, which, if enacted into law, will grant such franchise to the Delaware & New Jersey Bridge Corporation and others; and

Whereas it is deemed highly desirable that a bridge be constructed across the Delaware River at this point for the development of the entire southern section of the State of New Jersey, and in the interests of interstate communications; and

Whereas the State of New Jersey is not in a financial position to cooperate with the State of Delaware in the construction of this very desirable public improvement: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of assembly (the senate concurring), (1) That the Legislature of the State of New Jersey do recommend to the Congress of the United States the prompt passage of such act; and be it further

Resolved, That an official copy of this resolution, signed by the speaker, and attested to by the clerk of the house, respectively, be forwarded to each Member in Congress from this State, to the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

We hereby certify that the above resolution is a true and official copy of the resolution adopted by the house of assembly on April 24, 1929.

GUY GEORGE GOLENDEN,
Speaker of the House of Assembly.

Attest:

FREDERICK A. BRODESSER,
Clerk of the House of Assembly.

NEW JERSEY SENATE, June 24, 1929.

This is to certify that the following resolution was passed by the New Jersey Senate in session on June 24, 1929, and concurred in by the House of Assembly on the same date:

Whereas the governor of this State in his inaugural address called attention to the importance of the proposed canal across this State to link up the Delaware River with New York Bay; and

Whereas the State has spent thousands of dollars in a survey begun in 1911 and in monumenting the course of the canal; has appropriated $150,000 toward the cost of acquiring the right of way; and has practically pledged proceeds from the sale of the Morris Canal for the acquisition of such right of way; and

Whereas the Federal Government has practically completed its traffic survey and study of the proposed canal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of assembly concurring), That we urge upon the Congress of the United States and the various departments connected with the inception and completion of this project to speed in every possible way the building of this important link in our great national system of waterways.

THOMAS A. MATHIS,
President of the Senate.

Attest:

ROBERT M. JOHNSTON,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Certificate No. 2398

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, William J. Stratton, secretary of state of the State of Illinois, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true photostatic copy of Senate Joint Resolution No. 27, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State of Illinois.

Done at the city of Springfield this 20th day of June, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] WILLIAM J. STRATTON,
Secretary of State.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
FIFTY-SIXTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Senate Joint Resolution 27

Whereas, in the absence of control, there has grown up a class of interstate motor bus operation which is entirely unregulated and altogether irresponsible and subject to the regulation of no State or Federal authority whatever; and

Whereas the traveling public is being constantly victimized by such operators crossing State lines between Illinois and neighboring States, and who resort to all sorts of illegitimate and unscrupulous activities at the expense of travelers who are unable to obtain redress; and

Whereas the bus lines operating under the regulation of the Illinois Commerce Commission are a source of large revenue to the State, and now constitute one of the State's major public utilities; and

Whereas the activities of the unregulated interstate "wildcat" operators subject both the legitimate stage lines and other forms of transportation to unfair, injurious, and unscrupulous competition; and

Whereas the present condition is highly detrimental to the interests of the State of Illinois, to the legitimate transportation interests, to the traveling public, and to the public generally; and

Whereas such conditions present an urgent need for adequate Federal regulation, at least as to proper certification and control: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Fifty-sixth General Assembly of the State of Illinois (the House of Representatives concurring herein), That the President of the United States, the Senate and House of Representatives of the present Congress, and the Interstate Commerce Commission be memorialized to take all possible and necessary action to provide proper legislation to control and regulate the activities of interstate motor-bus lines; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the present Congress, and to each Senator and Representative therein from the State of Illinois, and to each member of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Adopted by the senate June 4, 1929.

FRED E. STERLING,
President of the Senate.
JAMES H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives, June 8, 1929.

DAVID E. SHANAHAN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEORGE C. BLAEUER,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Filed 10 a. m., June 20, 1929.

WILLIAM J. STRATTON,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Senate Joint Resolution 83

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to discharge the mandatory duties imposed upon it by Article V of the Constitution of the United States to call a convention to propose amendments to the Constitution

Whereas the legislatures of the following 35 States have filed a formal application with Congress to call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States: Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and Wisconsin; and

Whereas Article V of the Constitution of the United States reads as follows: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate"; and

Whereas this article makes it mandatory upon the Congress of the United States to call a convention for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution whenever two-thirds of the States shall have made application therefor: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully requests that the Congress of the United States perform the mandatory duty imposed upon it by the above-quoted Article V and forthwith call a convention to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. FERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Senate Joint Resolution 87

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to enact legislation requiring that all motor vehicles operated across State lines into States having compulsory automobile liability insurance be covered by liability insurance for damages to persons

Whereas it is a recognized fact that in a large number of cases persons injured by motor vehicles are unable to recover damages for the reason that the guilty party owns no property or carries no liability insurance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin does hereby urge Congress to pass legislation requiring that all motor vehicles operated across State lines into States having compulsory automobile liability insurance be covered by liability insurance for damages to persons; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, properly attested, be sent to the President of the United States and to the presiding officers of both Houses and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. FERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Senate Joint Resolution 101

Joint resolution relating to the proposed import duty on shingles and cedar lumber

Whereas the tariff bill which has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the United States Senate provides for an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent on shingles and on cedar lumber commodities which have always been on the free list; and

Whereas this duty, if it shall become effective, will materially increase building costs in all parts of this country and will prove most burdensome to farmers and persons building their homes who use shingles and cedar lumber in large quantities; and

Whereas practically all shingles and cedar lumber now imported come from Canada, and the imposition of this proposed duty can not fail to be resented in Canada, a nation with which we have always been at peace and upon whose cooperation we must depend to put through the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, which is so vital to the Middle West and the entire country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to strike out the provision in the present tariff bill imposing a duty on shingles and cedar lumber and to continue these commodities on the free list; be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of this resolution be sent to both Houses of Congress and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

HENRY A. HUBER,
President of the Senate.
O. G. MUNSON,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
CHAS. B. FERRY,
Speaker of the Assembly.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the convention of Accomac Temple, No. 1, Order of United Americans, at Atlantic City, favoring the enforcement of the national-origins clause of the immigration law, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Postmasters' Association of Texas, relative to the manner of the appointment of postmasters in the State of Texas, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by members of the junior committee of the National Patriotic Association, at Chicago, Ill., relative to persons employed as teachers or professors taking exception to an oath of allegiance to our National Constitution as a prerequisite to employment and opposing the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and "entreating parents to arm their children with the protective spirit of reverent national pride," etc., which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the convention of the Michigan State Pramaceutical Association favoring the passage of the so-called Capper-Kelly bill, "legalizing the right of any producer of identified merchandise who is in fair and open competition with other producers of similar or competing merchandise to enter into enforceable contracts, at wholesale or retail, or both, for the protection of resale prices upon his own identified merchandise," which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Michigan State Pharmaceutical Association favoring the passage of a resolution to amend the national defense act by providing for a pharmaceutical corps in the Medical Department of the United States Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Michigan State Pharmaceutical Association, commending the services rendered retail druggists and drug-store patrons by Michigan Members of Congress who voted down proposed increase in the duty on blackstrap molasses, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Seventh Annual Convention of the United Spanish War Veterans, Department of Tennessee, at Memphis, Tenn., favoring the passage of legislation amending the national defense act by providing for a pharmaceutical corps in the Medical Department of the United States Army, and favoring the making of certain additions to the United States Veterans' Hospital No. 88, at Memphis, Tenn., etc., which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, of California, pledging honest and energetic support to the law-enforcement program as announced by President Hoover, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Grand Lodge, Knights of Pythias, of California, favoring immediate downward revision of Federal income taxes on earned incomes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of North America, at Winona Lake, Ind., expressing gratification at the ratification of the slavery and liquor traffic conventions, and urging the ratification of the convention revising the act of Berlin; favoring putting the Asiatic nations upon the quota immigration basis and the entrance of the United States into the World Court, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea, Mass., protesting against the outrages and horrors being perpetrated in Palestine against people of the Hebrew faith, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Public Forum of Brooklyn Heights (Inc.), at Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring the passage of the so-called Robsion bill, providing for the establishment of a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Washington Camp, No. 7, Patriotic Order Sons of America, at Cleveland, Ohio, favoring passage of the so-called Robsion bill, providing for the establishment of a Federal department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Chicago Federation of Labor, WCFL radio broadcast station, stating, in part, "in the reallocation of November 11, 1928, by the Federal Radio Commission, without any public hearing, there were given away 40 cleared, unlimited time channels, with increased power, to the Radio Trust and its closely allied interests, while WCFL, the 'Voice of Labor,' representing some 5,000,000 of dues-paying workingmen and women, was reduced in power and is now being blanketed by the Radio Trust's powerful stations and permitted to broadcast in daytime only," etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from S. Robert Schwartz & Bro., of New York, N. Y., relative to the proposed rates of duty on illuminating glassware in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by officers of the International Advertising Association, of New York, N. Y., approving the remission of duty on advertising matter, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN LEGION, DEPARTMENT OF ARIZONA

Mr. ASHURST presented resolutions adopted by the Eleventh Annual Convention of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, held at Williams, Ariz., in July, 1929, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 16

Whereas the Department of the Interior has refused permission to Grand Canyon Post of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, to build a post home at Grand Canyon, Ariz., within the boundaries of the Grand Canyon National Park except under prohibitive conditions, to wit:

(1) That the post home be open to all organizations and the general public at any and at all times.

(2) That no closed meetings be held by the John Ivens Post, but that all meetings be open to the public: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion, Department of Arizona, in convention assembled, That we regret the stand taken by the Department of the Interior and do ask the Park Department to reconsider the objectionable features of this ruling; further be it

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior, the Director of National Parks, and to the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, and the Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, our representatives in Washington.

Mr. ASHURST also presented resolutions adopted by the Eleventh Annual Convention of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 1

Whereas there are many men who contracted tuberculosis in line of duty while in the service and who were discharged from the service on a surgeon's certificate of disability because of pulmonary tuberculosis, but lacking the word "active" in the diagnosis of the disability; and

Whereas the Comptroller General of the United States in a decision rendered in November, 1928, required the United States Veterans' Bureau to deny the statutory award of $50 per month in such cases because of the absence of the word "active"; and

Whereas this decision is manifestly unfair and contrary to the spirit of the legislation enacted by Congress for the benefit of the disabled ex-service man and deprives a large number of men of the compensation justly due them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion of the Department of Arizona, in the name of justice and fairness, requests that the Congress of the United States enact the necessary legislation to overcome this and declaring that a surgeon's certificate of disability containing a diagnosis of pulmonary tuberculosis, though lacking the word "active," shall entitle the disabled veteran to the statutory award; be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be presented to the national convention of the American Legion and that copies be also sent to Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, and the Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, our representatives in Congress.

Resolution 2

Whereas, in the opinion of medical experts, Arizona is an ideal place for the treatment and cure of tuberculosis; and

Whereas the Government has recognized this fact by the establishment in this State of two large tuberculosis hospitals, one at Tucson and one at Prescott; and

Whereas Veterans' Bureau Hospital No. 50, located at Prescott, is not the property of the Veterans' Bureau but is subject at any time to the demands of the War Department, in which event it would be abandoned as a hospital; and

Whereas it is the sense of this convention that the hospital at Tucson and at Prescott should be operated by the Veterans' Bureau as tuberculosis hospitals so long as there are ex-service men in need of such hospitalization; and

Whereas the uncertainty in connection with the hospital at Whipple hinders the development and improvement of same by the bureau and is harmful to the morale of the patients: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the proper steps be taken to transfer the Whipple hospital from the War Department to the United States Veterans' Bureau and that the proper departments of the Government, our representatives in Congress, and the national organization of the American Legion be asked to aid in bringing about such a transfer.

Resolution 7

Whereas the terms of the Government converted insurance are not as liberal as are those of most of the old-line companies in this, that the policies of old-line companies provide for the payment of double the face value of the policy in the event of accidental death, and also provide for the payment of $10 per month for each thousand dollars of insurance, together with a waiver of premiums in case of total permanent disability, and this payment is not deducted from the face of the policy; and

Whereas the main purpose of life insurance is to provide a legacy or estate for the dependents of the insured; and

Whereas in the case of Government converted insurance this estate is depleted by the payment of total permanent benefits: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American Legion for the Department of Arizona favors legislation which will give the ex-service men the same insurance protection provided by the terms of the standard old-line policies; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be presented to the national convention of the American Legion, and that a copy be mailed to each of Arizona's representatives in Congress.

Mr. ASHURST also presented resolutions adopted by the Eleventh Annual Convention of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 8

Whereas it is the sincere belief of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, an organization composed of ex-soldiers, sailors, and marines, that ample and adequate protection should be furnished; and

Whereas the need for this protection has been in evidence for the past 19 years at Nogales and 13 years at Douglas, Ariz., for the following reasons:

1. Troops have been stationed at Nogales for 19 years and at Douglas for 13 years.
2. Ideal climate make training a year-round feature.
3. Nogales is the northern terminus of the S. P. de Mex. Railroad.
4. Troops increase friendly relations with Mexico and its people rather than cause friction.
5. Every revolution has had its inception in Sonora and almost always in Nogales. (The last one started and finished here.)
6. All of the shooting and fighting heretofore began without even a moment's warning.
7. The American troops at present are inadequately housed.
8. Modern warfare has so changed fighting that military forces unless stationed where needed are of no value.
9. Nogales and Douglas are two of the important commercial points of the Mexican border: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Arizona, at their annual convention go on record as favoring a permanent military post at Nogales, Ariz., and at Douglas, Ariz.; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, and the Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, our representatives in Congress, with the request that they place the matter before the War Department.

Resolution 9

Whereas there are millions of young men who will be called upon for service in an emergency who will never benefit under the present system of citizens' military training for reason that their parents or guardians are not financially able to spare their services during the season of the year authorized and best suited for this training: Therefore be it

Resolved, That legislation be secured which will permit of those who so desire enlisting in the citizens' military training camp for one month's citizenship training each year, and that they be paid, rationed, and clothed during this period of training as provided for enlisted men of the Regular Army and National Guard.

Resolution 10

Whereas it is obviously fair, and it is believed it will be appreciated by those affected who held commissions and rendered honorable service during the World War and by reason of peace-time conditions were obliged to return to the rank they held before receiving their commissions and continue their service until they are eligible for retirement: Therefore be it

Resolved, That legislation be secured authorizing that those who retire from the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps be breveted to the highest rank held by them during their service in the World War, provided it is higher rank than that held at retirement.

Resolution 11

Whereas it is believed that enlisted men who have served their country for a period of 25 years in the first line of our national defense in the Army under the strenuous training which is necessary to develop the class of professional soldier desired have reached the age that their places can be filled to a better advantage by younger men: Therefore be it

Resolved, That legislation be secured authorizing the retirement of enlisted men in time of peace after 25 years of honorable service.

Resolution 14

Whereas the members of the American Legion, through their experience in the World War, are keenly appreciative of the necessity for an adequate national defense in time of emergency: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we pledge anew our faith in the fundamental principles enunciated in the national defense act of 1920 as being in just accordance with the necessity of national security and in keeping with American aversion to militarism; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be urged to make continual appropriation to maintain an adequate national defense.

Resolution 15, pledging continued support to the Legion national universal draft bill

Whereas there has been introduced into Congress a bill known generally as the American Legion universal draft bill; and

Whereas this measure, which provides for the conscription of all the economic resources of the Nation in addition to its man power in periods of national emergency; and

Whereas this bill has had the support of the American Legion and all other veteran organizations and of many of the leaders in the public life of the Nation for many years; and

Whereas the provisions of this bill are aimed at an equal distribution of the responsibilities of national defense among all the people of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the American Legion, Department of Arizona, in convention assembled, do go on record as indorsing this measure and as supporting the thesis upon which it is based—that of equal responsibility; and be it further

Resolved, That we do call upon the national organization of the American Legion to continue to use all its influence in the effort to secure the enactment into law of this measure; and be it further

Resolved, That any measure not substantially in accord with that heretofore submitted by the American Legion be not considered by the Congress; be it

Resolved further, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST, the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, and the Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS, our representatives in Congress.

TARIFF ON SUGAR

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram and certain resolutions relating to the sugar schedule in the tariff bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram and resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW IBERIA, LA., September 4, 1929.

Senator E. S. BROUSSARD:

New Iberia Rotary, considering tariff a nonpolitical but great economic, join in expressing the urgent need for immediate relief for sugar. The long period of failures would be aggravated if cane growers do not get benefit on this crop. Present to proper parties.

W. R. DODSON.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Houma-Terrebonne Chamber of Commerce, at Houma, La., August 28, 1929

Whereas the persistent efforts of a few sugar-cane planters of Terrebonne Parish, in the face of plant disease and floods, met with success in the propagation and subsequent distribution of new varieties of sugar canes, thus instilling a feeling of optimism and hope; and

Whereas all of the efforts brought forth in attempting to revive the sugar industry will have been in vain unless adequate tariff protection measures are enacted by Congress now in session: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we deplore the attitude of those opposed to protecting a major industry against foreign invasion of cheap sugars produced by peons and in so doing bring ruin and poverty in our midst; and be it further

Resolved, That it be made known that the proposed slight increase in the tariff on sugar, adopted by the National House of Representatives, making the rate 3 cents per pound against world sugar and 2.4 cents against Cuban sugar, will only entail a greater per capita expense of 35 cents a year; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to President Herbert Hoover and to each Senator and Congressman from Louisiana; to the publicity department of the Domestic Sugar Producers' Association, Washington, D. C., and to the leading newspapers of Louisiana and Mississippi.

P. L. HAWKINS, Secretary.

AWARD OF MEDALS TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs certain correspondence between the Secretary of War, The Adjutant General, some other interested parties, and myself in reference to an amendment offered by me in the Senate March 24, 1928, which amendment was adopted by the Senate and by the House of Representatives and made a part of House bill 5898, the Seventieth Congress, which became chapter 751, to be found in the Statutes of the United States of America passed by the first session of the Seventieth Congress, page 747.

The act does not show the history of this amendment but it is published as part of the original bill.

It will be shown by this correspondence that the amendment offered by me and which was adopted, has been construed, as I intended it should, to direct the awarding of medals to American soldiers of the World War as well as to allow them to accept foreign medals, as stated in the title of the bill.

The title of the bill should have been amended as per the statement of the managers' note on the part of the House and the conference report submitted May 18, 1928.

There being no objection, the correspondence was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST, NO. 1,
Atlanta, Ga., March 21, 1928.

The Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed is an editorial which appeared in an Atlanta paper on March 12, 1928, and copied in other sections of the country. It treats on a bill introduced both in the Senate and House of Representatives for the extension of time for the award of medals to World War veterans.

This editorial contains truths which we feel ought to be brought to your attention for immediate action.

May we ask for your consideration on the merits of this bill and then the action you think it deserves?

We have the honor to be, sir,

ATLANTA POST, NO. 1, THE AMERICAN LEGION,
By FRANK A. HAAS, Adjutant.

[Inclosure]

THIS SHAMEFUL INDIFFERENCE SHOULD BE REMEDIED

Since April, 1923, it has been impossible, no matter how meritorious the case, to award a medal of honor, a distinguished service medal, or a distinguished service cross to any service man of the World War.

In the Congress of 1923–1924 Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, introduced a very simple bill to extend the time for only one year to award these medals on proper recommendation and consideration.

For the past five years this bill has been reintroduced; and Senator HAWES, of Missouri, took up the cudgels in association with Senator HARRIS for the right to have an appreciative nation recognize those who served with the most distinction and merit and award a slight token that would not cost the Nation a dollar of appropriation.

Just why Congress is so indifferent to this matter is hard to account for, unless it be that the War Department itself is indifferent, thus influencing Congress to an extent without Congress particularly noticing it.

There is reason to suspect that the War Department is indifferent, if not actually hostile.

The Regulars are plastered with ribbons; they have been taken care of and perhaps are willing to let things slide.

There are those, too, who are too modest or too proud to fight for their rights.

If they are entitled to service medals because of their deeds, if their records are clear and their deserts manifest, why should they not be rewarded accordingly without any time limit?

Why on earth should it be held that a man entitled to a decoration in April, 1923, is not entitled to it to-day?

If distinguished and meritorious service come to light 25 years after the close of the war, why should not the award be made accordingly?

Efforts to get that view into the bigwigs of the War Department seem of no avail; but it looks as if some pressure is to be brought before Congress after all.

The American Legion is taking the matter up vigorously and the Atlanta Post thereof is bestirring itself.

The Disabled American Veterans of the World War is lending a hand and the American Federation of Labor is putting itself vigorously on record as demanding action and justice in this situation.

If it be true that this bill has been hopelessly hung up in the military committees of both Houses of Congress and that the reason therefor is the attitude of the War Department, then all the Georgian has to say is that the War Department has assumed a shameful and wholly unworthy and un-American attitude!

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 24, 1928.

FRANK A. HAAS, Adjutant,
224 Palmer Building, Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR SIR: Your letter received with newspaper clipping inclosed. I am sorry I can't use it, but without knowing from what paper it comes I dare not do so.

I have already given notice that I expect to offer an amendment to a bill now pending providing for the matter about which you write. I have never heard of a bill being before the Senate on this subject. Possibly it was before I came here.

Kindest regards.

Very respectfully,

COLE L. BLEASE.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BLEASE to the bill (H. R. 5898) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered, viz: On page 4, after line 21, insert the following:

"That all recommendations for decoration by the United States of America now pending before the War Department, Navy Department, or Marine Corps for services rendered during the World War be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and awards made in such cases as the conduct of those recommended shows them to be entitled and deserving of the same."

THE AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST, NO. 1,
Atlanta, Ga., April 3, 1928.

Senator COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We express our sincere appreciation for your letter regarding the award of World War decorations.

Your amendment will no doubt force action which has been held back due to the attitude of the War Department.

Was this amendment attached to one of the War Department bills? We would appreciate details on this so as to help it to a finality.

The editorial we sent you was in the March 12 issue of the Atlanta Georgian.

A passive attitude has been maintained too long on this gross injustice and we appreciate militant, forceful men as yourself on the side of right.

We have the honor to be, sir,

Hon. FRANK A. HAAS,
Atlanta Post, No. 1, the American Legion,
22½ Palmer Building, Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR MR. HAAS: Senator BLEASE has your kind favor of April 3 in reply to his recent letter regarding the award of World War decorations, for which please accept the Senator's thanks.

I am pleased to inclose herewith a copy of the amendment which was offered to House bill 5898, and the Senator will appreciate very much any assistance which you and other members of the Legion may be in position to render in the pushing of the matter to a successful conclusion.

Thanking you for your interest and with all assurances of the Senator's high esteem, I am,

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

THE AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST, NO. 1,

Hon. COLE BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May we express our appreciation for your efforts in trying to extend the time for the award of medals to World War veterans, and also for sending us that part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD pertaining to it. The causes shown in that record are indeed worthy of the decoration recommended.

We are particularly interested in the bestowal of the distinguished-service cross as outlined in the inclosed cases.

The evidence was difficult to compile, as was the case in many instances, but we will leave it to any impartial judges if here again justice has not been amiss.

We have the honor to be, sir,

308 PALMER BUILDING,
Atlanta, Ga., December 2, 1926.

Subject: Distinguished-service cross for Maj. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery, and Milton A. Snyder, late first lieutenant, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

To: The Adjutant General of the Army.

1. It has just been brought to my attention that on March 28, 1923, C. D. Rhodes, colonel, General Staff Corps, former brigadier general One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, recommended to The Adjutant General of the Army that a distinguished-service cross be granted Milton A. Snyder, former lieutenant, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery, and Major Beere. I deem it proper to forward an earnest recommendation of the recommendation already made by General Rhodes.

2. The two officers mentioned in the recommendation—Lieut. Milton A. Snyder and Maj. Donald M. Beere—were together on the same hazardous artillery reconnaissance in front of the furthermost advanced Infantry lines of the Eightieth Division.

3. On November 3, 1918, I had gone to the advanced lines, being the division ammunition officer, Eighty-second Division, to establish locations for ammunition dumps and was with the Infantry at a place between Buzancy and Sommanthe, France. After reaching this point Lieutenant Snyder and Major Beere came up where I was, informed me that they were making a reconnaissance, and found that the advanced Infantry lines were at a standstill, being held back by the overwhelming German artillery and machine-gun fire. I remonstrated with them in going any farther, but heedless of personal safety and in spite of the fact that the German firing seemed impenetrable they advanced unarmed, made a thorough reconnaissance, procuring German rifles and ammunition, which they used on opening fire on the enemy while performing this courageous feat.

As stated in the recommendation of General Rhodes, the results of the observations of Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder located the artillery guns and machine-gun nests from which the German fire originated, and by immediately sending these observations and artillery to concentrate on these critical points, destroying and silencing the German guns. This enabled the Three hundred and eighteenth Infantry to advance. To all this I was witness.

4. These two officers performed the successful and hazardous reconnaissance, breaking up the German machine-gun and artillery emplacements, and was from the command of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, and was made voluntarily by these officers on their own initiative, well knowing that they had little chance to return alive and over my remonstrance to wait until dark. They both went so if one was killed the other would bring back the information desired for the safety of our Infantry, minimizing the losses.

5. I am making these recommendations because I had thought that the recommendations sent in by General Rhodes had already been granted and because I was personally present when these two officers went into the hazardous undertaking and know to my own knowledge that they should be rewarded with a distinguished-service cross, and I further recommend that they both be so awarded.

6. This is the only recommendation that I have ever made for a distinguished-service cross, although I have witnessed acts of heroism in which cases the distinguished-service cross has already been awarded, and I consider this a more meritorious case.

WILLIAM T. HOLLAND,
Former first lieutenant, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, headquarters, division ammunition officer, Eighty-second Division.

Sworn to.

[First indorsement]

Headquarters Fifth Corps Area, Fort Hayes, Columbus, Ohio, March 26, 1923. To The Adjutant General of the Army.

Forwarded.

For the corps area commander:

C. D. RHODES,
Chief of Staff.

Inclosures. No change. Twelve inclosures.

MARCH 28, 1923.

Subject: Distinguished-service cross for Maj. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery, and Milton A. Snyder, late first lieutenant, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

To: The Adjutant General of the Army.

1. As former commander of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, supporting the Eighty-second and later the Eightieth Division in the Meuse-Argonne major offensive, I recommend that the above-named officers be awarded the distinguished-service cross for extraordinary heroism in action, November 3, 1918, near Sommanthe, France, proposed citations appended.

2. The two officers are coupled in one recommendation, as they accompanied each other on the same hazardous artillery reconnaissance in front of the most advanced infantry lines.

3. The official affidavits and supporting evidence herewith refer mainly to Lieutenant Snyder, because the investigation was initiated concerning the latter officer, and due to Major Beere's modesty and present work at the Army Service Schools, it was not known until recently that Major Beere, as well as Lieutenant Snyder (now in civil life in Atlanta, Ga.) made the reconnaissance together.

4. As far as can be learned from all available testimony, the facts are as follows: On November 3, 1918, the Infantry of the Eightieth Division was held up, and in some places small units were even retiring from a point near Sommanthe, about 1 kilometer from Buzancy, by reason of overwhelming German artillery and machine-gun fire. Two artillery officers from headquarters, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder, voluntarily reconnoitered forward to report on artillery targets and new artillery positions. They found our Infantry halted or retiring. One company commander of Infantry informed them that it was impossible for a human being to go forward. In spite of this statement and in the face of the terrific German fire, Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder went forward alone through our advanced scouts and snipers to reconnoiter toward the German lines, and continued to a point several hundred yards beyond our most advanced Infantry front lines, Lieutenant Snyder being armed only with a pistol and a discarded German rifle.

The result of the observations of Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder was that the German resistance rested mainly on considerable artillery but principally on well-placed machine-gun fire, sweeping the area with indirect fire. These machine-gun nests were located under fire by these officers on a coordinate map which they had with them, and they then returned without regard of personal safety to our nearest Infantry lines. There, an infantry runner was sent with the firing data to our nearest artillery, and in a short time artillery fire was concentrated on the critical points and the German guns silenced. The advance Infantry lines of the Eightieth Division (Three hundred and eighteenth Infantry) were then able to advance.

5. This hazardous and successful reconnaissance which led to the breaking up of German resistance was made from the post of command, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, because of complete local stoppage of Infantry units, and was made voluntarily by the two officers concerned on their own initiative, well knowing the probability that one or both might never come back to our lines alive—the ultimate utilization of the desired location of the hostile artillery and machine guns being rendered more probable by reconnaissance of two officers rather than one.

6. These are most deserving cases which hitherto have not been brought to the attention of the War Department due to various causes, already partly referred to, but, also because:

(a) The division commanders and divisions changed (Eighty-second to Eightieth) about October 24, 1918.

(b) The commanders of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade (Colonel Rhodes, Colonel Pearce, and Gen. D. F. Craig) also changed three times in a short period, October 24 to November 11, 1918.

(c) The act of heroism was witnessed by but few officers, and they were emergency officers of Infantry, now in civil life.

7. These are the only recommendations for the distinguished-service cross made by me during the World War.

C. D. RHODES,
Colonel, General Staff Corps.

Twelve inclosures.

PROPOSED CITATION

Maj. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery, then lieutenant colonel, Field Artillery, and executive officer One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade. For extraordinary heroism in action near Sommanthe, France, November 3, 1918. When the front line Infantry units of the Eightieth Division were held up by overwhelming German artillery and machine-gun fire, Major Beere, with fearless disregard for personal safety and with another officer, pushed out several hundred yards beyond our most advanced Infantry scouts and snipers, and on a coordinate map located the position of enemy artillery and machine-gun nests, returning with the information to our lines through heavy hostile fire and furnishing same to the advanced artillery of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade in time to detroy or neutralize the enemy's fire and permit an advance of Infantry units of the Eightieth Division.

Address: Care of The Adjutant General of the Army, Washington, D. C.

PROPOSED CITATION

First Lieut. Milton A. Snyder, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery, and on duty with One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade headquarters, Eighty-second Division. For extraordinary heroism in action near Sommanthe, France, November 5, 1918. When the front-line Infantry units of the Eightieth Division were held up by overwhelming German artillery and machine-gun fire, Lieutenant Snyder, with fearless disregard for personal safety and with another officer, pushed out several hundred yards beyond our most advanced Infantry scouts and snipers, and on a coordinate map located the position of enemy artillery and machine-gun nests, returning with the information to our lines through heavy hostile fire and furnishing same to the advanced artillery of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade in time to destroy or neutralize the enemy's fire and permit an advance of Infantry units of the Eightieth Division.

Address: No. 6 Ponce de Leon Court, Atlanta, Ga.

ATLANTA, GA., December 22, 1922.

To: The Adjutant General, United States Army.
From: J. B. Conyers, former captain, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.
Subject: Recognition of valor of Milton A. Snyder, former lieutenant, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

1. Though several years have passed it is my recommendation that a deed of valor be rewarded by the granting of a distinguished-service cross to Milton A. Snyder, former lieutenant, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

2. On November 3, 1918, while operating with the Eightieth Division, 1 kilometer north of Buzancy, France, the Infantry were compelled to hold their advance because of obstinate resistance from enemy machine-gun fire. The guns could not be located from points of observation within our lines, and in spite of the deadly fire Lieutenant Snyder, at great danger of his life, advanced alone several hundred feet to a point of advantage through a raking fire, located the source of the fire, recording it on his map, and returned with the valuable information for the destruction of the resistance, which was promptly executed to the great morale of our troops, which action and coolness was an inspiration to the troops on all sides, for they saw him go beyond his duty for their safety and cause.

3. I have just learned the only reward for this meritorious work was a notation in his officer's record book, and as senior officer of a detail in the neighborhood at the time I am forwarding this recommendation.

J. B. CONYERS,
Former Captain, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

A true copy.

To whom it may concern:

I hereby certify that on November 3, 1918, while commanding the I Company of the Three hundred and eighteenth Infantry, Eightieth Division, the troops of the first line were halted by machine-gun and artillery-fire resistance on the front and right, and shut off from view by a crest on the immediate front near Buzancy, France.

Lieut. M. A. Snyder, from the Artillery supporting our division, came forward and I told him of the situation. Without hesitancy he proceeded through the fire and I saw him take a position a few hundred meters in front of us under heavy fire and observed by the enemy, returning with a record of this resistance which was later destroyed, and our line moved forward.

To Capt. JAMES B. CONYERS, F. A., C. R. C.,
167 Blueridge Avenue, Atlanta, Ga.:

1. With further reference to your recommendation for the award of the distinguished-service cross to First Lieut. Milton A. Snyder, formerly of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, Eighty-second Division, you are informed that upon consideration of the recommendation in connection with the record of service it has been decided by the department that the act in question was not of the extraordinary character of heroism for which, under the law, the distinguished-service cross is bestowed.

2. However, the conduct of First Lieutenant Snyder was not only commendable but gallant, and in view of this fact the Secretary of War directs that he be cited in War Department orders for gallantry in action, which citation entitled him to wear the silver-star decoration.

3. The Quartermaster General of the Army has been directed to forward such decoration to him.

By order of the Secretary of War:

M. J. O'BRINE, Adjutant General.

The Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledgment is made of your letter of April 5, inclosing your amendment to H. R. 5898.

We are using every effort through our national organization and other organizations to see your amendment to a successful conclusion.

Could we prevail upon you to see that the further recommendations for Maj. Donald M. Beere and Lieut. Milton A. Snyder as sent you a few days ago are on the list of the War Department should your amended bill be successful?

With deep appreciation for all your efforts in behalf of the World War service men.

We have the honor to be, sir.

Hon. FRANK A. HAAS,
Atlanta Post, No. 1, the American Legion,
224 Palmer Building, Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR MR. HAAS: Senator BLEASE has your kind favors of April 6 and 7, together with inclosures in reference to his proposed amendment to H. R. 5898.

In reply I am pleased to advise that the Senator's amendment to-day was adopted in the Senate, and it has now gone to the House for consideration. I can assure you that the Senator appreciates your kind interest very much and he will be glad if you and other members of the Legion will exert your influence to secure favorable consideration of the matter in the House of Representatives.

With all good wishes and assuring you of the Senator's high esteem, I am,

Very respectfully,

Mr. JOHN D. LONG, Secretary,
Care Office of Senator Cole T. Blease,
United States Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of April 9, 1928, regarding Senator BLEASE'S amendment to H. R. 5898 received, and we are delighted on its success so far. We are communicating with friends throughout the United States to exert every effort to see this to a successful conclusion.

We wrote the Senator on April 7 regarding the recommendation for Maj. Donald M. Beere and Lieut. Milton A. Snyder. Could you advise us if these officers are included on the list the War Department would consider if Senator BLEASE'S amendment is finally a law? Express to Senator BLEASE our sincere appreciation for his many works.

Very respectfully,

Hon. FRANK A. HAAS,
Adjutant Atlanta Post, No. 1, the American Legion,
22½ Palmer Building, Atlanta, Ga.

MY DEAR MR. HAAS: Your complimentary letter of April 11 to hand, for which please accept the thanks of Senator BLEASE. He also appreciates your efforts in behalf of further success for his amendment, which has passed the Senate.

The Senator notes your reference regarding the recommendation for Maj. Donald M. Beere and Lieut. Milton E. Snyder. In this connection I will advise that the Senator's amendment is designed to permit the consideration of the merits of all cases recommended to the War Department and regardless of the time when such recommendation is made.

Again thanking you for your kindness and assuring you of the Senator's esteem, I am,

Very respectfully,

DEAR SIR: Your amendment to H. R. 5898, in which we, too, are intensely interested to pass, has been sent to conference on the request of Mr. Thomas S. Butler, chairman of Naval Affairs in the House.

Does this mean defeat through lack of time, or do you believe there is a fair chance of it going through?

We are addressing the members of the joint conference committee asking for their favorable consideration.

Very truly yours,

MY DEAR MR. HAAS: Senator BLEASE has your letter of April 24, in reference to his amendment to H. R. 5898, which you are interested in.

In reply the Senator begs to advise that he is afraid that the report of his amendment, having been sent to conference on request of Mr. Thomas S. Butler, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives, means that it will be defeated.

You may be assured, however, that he appreciates your efforts in behalf of the favorable consideration of this amendment and he expects to continue his endeavors to have the same passed and enacted into law.

Hoping that this will be satisfactory and assuring you of his kindest regards, I am

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

[Report No. 1741, House of Representatives, Seventieth Congress, first session]

AUTHORIZE CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS TO ACCEPT DECORATIONS, ORDERS, AND MEDALS TENDERED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. BRITTEN, from the committee of conference, submitted the following conference report (to accompany H. R. 5898):

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5898) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, and from its disagreement to the amendment to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

FRED A. BRITTEN,
CLARK BURDICK,
CARL VINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

FREDERICK HALE,
DAVID A. REED,
CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5898) authorizing certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the following amendments, namely:

No. 1: By the insertion of the word "Army" the Senate amendment merely includes officers of the Army in the following lists of those who are authorized to accept foreign decorations.

Nos. 2 to 11, inclusive, designates by name and rank, various officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, who are authorized to accept foreign decorations, and the final paragraph of amendment No. 11 provides further "that all recommendations for decoration by the United States of America now pending before the War Department, Navy Department, or Marine Corps for services rendered during the World War be considered by the proper boards or authorities, and awards made in such cases as the conduct of those recommended shows them to be entitled and deserving of the same."

As all of the Senate amendments are in accord with the original desire of the bill (H. R. 5898) the managers on the part of the House recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate.

FRED A. BRITTEN,
CLARK BURDICK,
CARL VINSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

THE AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST, NO. 1,
Atlanta, Ga., June 4, 1928.

The Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The final passage of your amendment to H. R. 5898 for the award of medals to World War veterans was an event we can not let pass without expressing to you our appreciation and thanks for this splendid work.

There were others who helped magnificently, but it was you that had the vision to recognize the unfairness of conditions in rewarding valor and corrected it with forceful, intelligent directness. We salute you and honor you for your services.

Would you render us one other favor by examining the inclosed papers, which are copies of the originals on file in Washington, and then vigorously contacting the War Department that the recommendations contained in these papers be fulfilled? Believe us to be always at your service.

We have the honor to be, sir,

THE ATLANTA POST, NO. 1, THE AMERICAN LEGION,

PENDLETON, S. C., June 8, 1928.

Hon. FRANK A. HAAS,
Adjutant, Atlanta Post, No. 1, the American Legion,
Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR MR. HAAS: Senator BLEASE has your very kind favor of June 4, for which please accept the Senator's sincere thanks. It is a joy to labor for those who respond with such splendid appreciation, and I can assure you that the war veterans of America have a close hold upon the Senator's affections.

I am inclosing herewith copy of letter which has this day been forwarded to the Hon. Dwight F. Davis, Secretary of War, and which the Senator hopes will be productive of the desired results.

With all good wishes and again assuring you of the Senator's appreciation and kindest regards, I beg to be

Very respectfully,

PENDLETON, S. C., June 8, 1928.

Hon. DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War, Department of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Senator BLEASE is advised that his amendment to H. R. 5898 for the award of medals to World War veterans has been enacted.

The Senator begs to bring to your attention the inclosed papers, which are copies of originals on file in the War Department at Washington, and he will appreciate very much your kindness in seeing that the recommendations contained in these papers be fulfilled as early as possible.

Thanking you for your courtesy, and with assurances of the Senator's high esteem, I beg to be

Very respectfully,

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 14, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Columbia, S. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 8th instant with which you inclosed copies of papers pertaining to the award of the distinguished-service cross to Maj. Donald M. Beere and First Lieut. Milton A. Snyder, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery, and refer to recent legislation permitting the consideration of recommendations for decorations now on file in the War Department.

The cases of Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder will be investigated, and at the conclusion of the investigation, which may require considerable time, I will again communicate with you.

Sincerely yours,

C. P. SUMMERALL,
Acting Secretary of War.

GREENVILLE, S. C., June 20, 1928.

Mr. JOHN D. LONG,
Secreary to Senator Cole L. Blease, Pendleton, S. C.

DEAR MR. LONG: Complying with the request of Senator BLEASE, I am sending to you the inclosed copy of my letter to Senator L. D.

Tyson, together with true copies of the certificates made by Lieut. Col. J. C. Persons and Col. Robert H. Peck.

Colonel Persons, who is president of the American Traders National Bank, Birmingham, Ala., recently recommended that I be awarded the D. S. C. and sent me copies of these certificates.

As I am going to training camp on active duty at Fort McPherson, Atlanta, Ga., from July 1 to July 15, I would certainly like to receive this award, if possible, while on active duty; and Gen. Carey F. Spence, who is in command of my brigade, and on whose staff I will serve, told me to take this matter up with General Tyson, and I am indeed glad that Senator BLEASE stated that he would also write to the War Department in my behalf.

Senator Tyson stated that he was not positive that this amendment had been favorably acted upon or whether it would cover recommendations made at this time, and I am glad to know that you have received the information that this act has been made law.

Thanking you for any assistance you can give, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

C. B. BOND,
Captain, Infantry Reserve.

Address: Bond-Sanders Paper Co., Nashville, Tenn.

PENDLETON, S. C., June 22, 1928.

Hon. DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War, Department of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Senator BLEASE will appreciate very much your kind attention to the attached copies of letters appertaining to the award of military medal to Capt. C. B. Bond, captain, Infantry Reserve, Bond-Sanders Paper Co., Nashville, Tenn.

Thanking you for your courtesy and with assurances of the Senator's high esteem, I beg to be

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

THE AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST NO. 1,
Atlanta, Ga., June 25, 1928.

Senator COLE BLEASE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We are informed that cases for the awarding of the distinguished-service cross are to be considered by The Adjutant General's Department of the War Department, to determine which ones should be submitted to the board of awards for final judgment.

Inclosed is a copy of recommendation in the case of Capt. M. A. Snyder which was made after a former board completed its action and which under the recent enacted law makes this case eligible for consideration.

You have been interested in this worthy case, and your kindness in sending the inclosure to The Adjutant General with request that it be submitted to the official now reviewing these recommendations will be greatly appreciated. We are anxious to secure full consideration of this meritorious matter by the board and feel sure it will be so considered if your letter with the inclosure reaches the official in charge. We desire to avoid an adverse report due to lack of complete information.

We have the honor to be, sir,

AMERICAN LEGION, ATLANTA POST, NO. 1,
FRANK A. HAAS, Adjutant.

Inclosure acknowledged by The Adjutant General, March 25, 1927.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 27, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Columbia, S. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 22d instant with which you inclosed copies of letters pertaining to the award of the distinguished service cross to Capt. C. B. Bond, Infantry Reserve, Bond-Sanders Paper Co., Nashville, Tenn.

The time limit set by law within which the distinguished service cross could be awarded for an act performed during the World War, expired on April 7, 1923. By act of Congress approved May 26, 1928, the War Department is authorized to consider recommendations for decorations "now pending" before the department. The words "now pending" as used in the law, limit its applicability to those cases in which recommendations for decorations were pending in the department on the date of the enactment of the law on May 26, 1928. The recommendation for distinguished-service cross, made in behalf of Capain Bond, was received on June 5, 1928, and inasmuch as it was not on file in the department on May 26, 1928, the department can not act upon his case as the law precludes such action.

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

PENDLETON, S. C., June 29, 1928.

Maj. Gen. LUTZ WAHL,
Office of The Adjutant General, Department of War,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: Senator BLEASE is advised that cases for the awarding of the distinguished service cross are to be considered by The Adjutant General's Department of the War Department to determine which ones should be submitted to the board of awards for final judgment.

Inclosed is a copy of recommendation in the case of Capt. M. A. Snyder which was made after a former board completed its action and which under the recently enacted law makes this case eligible for consideration.

The Senator feels that this is a worthy and very deserving case. He will, therefore, appreciate highly any action which you may be in position to take in expediting the favorable consideration of same.

Thanking you for your courtesy, I beg to be, sir,

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 2, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Columbia, S. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: I desire to acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 29, with which you inclosed a copy of a recommendation submitted by William T. Holland, formerly first lieutenant, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, for the award of the distinguished service cross to Maj. Milton A. Snyder, Field Artillery Reserve, and ask that the recommendation be considered for an award.

The original recommendation, dated December 3, 1926, is on file in the War Department. The copy which you inclosed is therefore returned herewith. I have referred the case of Major Snyder to the board of awards in the department, and when final action has been taken in his case I shall again communicate with you.

Very respectfully,

LUTZ WAHL,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 13, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Columbia, S. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Further reference is made to your letter of June 29, 1928, in regard to the award of the distinguished-service cross to Maj. Milton A. Snyder, Field Artillery Reserve, formerly first lieutenant, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, for his conduct in France during the World War.

The recommendations of Churchill B. Mehard, formerly lieutenant colonel Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery, and William T. Holland, formerly first lieutenant One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, together with the previous recommendations received in the case of Major Snyder, have been most carefully considered by the board of awards in the War Department, and it has been decided that the act performed by this officer, while commendable and gallant, does not meet the standard set by law for the award of the distinguished-service cross. The silver-star citation heretofore awarded to him is considered to be the appropriate reward for the measure of gallantry displayed.

I regret my inability to give you a more favorable reply.

Very respectfully,

LUTZ WAHL,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., July 17, 1928.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senator, Columbia, S. C.

DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Further reference is made to your letter of June 8, 1928, relative to the award of the distinguished-service cross to Maj. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery, and Maj. Milton A. Snyder, Field Artillery Reserve, in which letter you refer to recent legislation permitting reconsideration of recommendations for decorations.

The recommendations of Churchill B. Mehard, formerly lieutenant colonel Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery, and William T. Holland, formerly first lieutenant, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade, together with the previous recommendations received in the cases of Majors Beere and Snyder, have been most carefully considered by the board of awards in the War Department and it has been decided that the act performed by these officers, while commendable and gallant, does not meet the standard set by law for the award of the distinguished-service cross. The silver-star citations heretofore awarded to them are considered to be appropriate rewards for the measure of gallantry displayed.

Thanking you for your continued interest in the service and regretting my inability to give you a more favorable reply, I am,

Sincerely yours,

DWIGHT F. DAVIS,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, August 28, 1929.

Hon. COLE L. BLEASE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BLEASE: Reference is made to your letter of June 8, 1928, addressed to the Secretary of War, and your letter of June 29, 1928, addressed to this office, concerning the recommendations for the award of the distinguished-service cross to Maj. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery, formerly lieutenant colonel Three hundred and twentieth Field Artillery, and Milton A. Snyder, formerly first lieutenant, One hundred and fifty-seventh Field Artillery Brigade.

The cases of Major Beere and Lieutenant Snyder have received further consideration by the decorations board in the War Department, and as a result of additional evidence the board has recommended and the Secretary of War has approved of the award of the distinguished-service cross to these officers.

Very respectfully,

JAMES F. MCKINLEY,
Brigadier General,
Acting The Adjutant General.

THE PRESIDENT'S POWER TO REVISE TARIFF DUTIES

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Baltimore Sun of August 30 last dealing with the power of the President to revise tariff duties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, August 30, 1929]

A VICIOUS PROPOSAL

By authorizing the President to make tariff changes to equalize "competitive conditions" the Republicans of the Senate Finance Committee, following the lead of the House, have paved the way for all manner of tariff making by Executive decree. If the test of the President's power to make as much as 50 per cent increases and decreases in the tariff is to be "competitive conditions" it means that the personal charm of British or German salesmen, the disposition of Paris exporters to show American importers around their town, and the speed and courtesy with which foreign exporters fill American orders all become possible bases for tariff changes.

The Federal Trade Commission has issued orders against liberal treating by traveling salesmen—giving away lots of cigars, etc.—as "unfair competition." By the same token the tariff might be raised on French wares because thirsty American importers, dined and wined in the French capital, acquired a friendly disposition toward French exporters to the competitive disadvantage of American manufacturers.

The idea of competition is relatively simple, but its manifestations take countless forms and are extremely subtle. There is no way on earth to measure all of them and provide a formula for equalizing competitive conditions. It is a matter of judgment.

The present flexible tariff law authorizes rate changes when necessary to equalize costs of production. It is an extremely clumsy arrangement. There is no agreement on just what cost of production includes. Cost figures are naturally hard to get from foreign manufacturers, who know they may be used to increase tariffs. For many commodities there are thousands of costs of production, and the choice of particular ones for tariff making involves a difficult judgment.

But while cost of production is a slippery basis for adjusting tariff rates it is infinitely more capable of objective measurement than "competitive conditions." Under the "competitive conditions" standard the President, acting in conjunction with the Tariff Commission, is given far greater leeway than he has at present to make tariff changes.

If a "workable" standard for flexible tariff changes is what is desired the plan of equalizing competitive conditions provides it. It can be worked beautifully and would make possible a large transfer of tariff making from Congress to administrative departments.

If, however, the desire is to have tariff rates made by Congress under conditions that give the public a chance to know what is going on, the scheme proposed is a vicious one.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes. In connection with and accompanying the bill I submit the report of the Finance Committee on the bill (Rept. No. 37).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he is going to have the report printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be printed in the usual form under the law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it should be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be printed in the RECORD.

The report (No. 37) this day submitted by Mr. SMOOT is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 37, 71st Cong., 1st sess.]

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1929

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 2667):

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, reports favorably thereon with amendments and, as amended, recommends that the bill do pass.

SCHEDULE 1.—CHEMICALS, OILS, AND PAINTS

Schedule 1, as revised by the committee, represents a decided decrease in the bill as passed by the House of Representatives and a very small increase over the rates in the act of 1922.

The equivalent ad valorem rate on all chemicals and allied products entered for duty under Schedule 1, based on the imports during 1928, is 29.83 per cent in the Senate bill, as compared with 32.34 and 29.32 per cent, respectively, in the House bill and in the act of 1922. This is a decrease of 7.8 per cent in the equivalent ad valorem of the House bill and an increase of 1.7 per cent over the act of 1922. The ad valorem rate of the chemical schedule is substantially lower than that in most of the other dutiable schedules.

The calculated revenue from the chemical schedule as revised, based on imports during 1928, is $28,167,754, or $2,366,981 less than is shown in the House bill and $481,288 more than in the act of 1922.

The committee received requests for rate changes in 50 of the 98 paragraphs of the House bill. Rates were changed in 35 paragraphs, 6 commodities received specific mention, and a change in phraseology was made in 5 paragraphs. A total of 74 rates were changed—56 representing decreases and 18 increases. Of the decreases, 19 were by transfer from the dutiable to the free list. The increases concern chiefly those industries in which competition from imports was particularly severe or existing rates of duty failed to equalize differences in domestic costs of production and foreign prices. Most of the decreases were on commodities in the manufacture of which the domestic industry is firmly established and foreign competition negligible. These commodities include nitric acid, calcium carbide, carbon tetrachloride, synthetic indigo, sulphur black, and ink and ink powders.

A departure from the course pursued by the Ways and Means Committee was the recommendation by the committee for decreases even though no requests had been received by either committee of Congress. It was the opinion of the committee that the rates on certain products in the act of 1922 were unnecessarily high because of changed conditions in the industry following the passage of that act.

Articles transferred from the dutiable list to the free list are:

Nitric acid.	Ergot.
Bleached shellac.	London purple.
Crude chicle.	Kieserite.
Tea waste.	Rapeseed oil (when denatured).
Sarsaparilla root.	Sesame oil (when denatured).
Gentian.	Sunflower-seed oil (when denatured).
Belladonna.
Digitalis.	Eucalyptus oil.
Henbane.	Arrowroot starch.
Stramonium.	Tar and pitch of wood.

The above articles are in addition to the 12 items transferred to the free list in the House bill.

SYNTHETIC ORGANIC CHEMICALS

The outstanding development in the domestic chemical industry since the war is in the organic field which, in the main, divides itself into two groups—non-coal-tar and coal-tar chemicals.

Paragraph 2: Progress in the non-coal-tar organic chemical industry has probably equaled that in the coal-tar chemical industry. This is notably true in the development of hydrocarbon derivatives covered in paragraph 2, in solvents, fermentation chemicals, and other synthetic products. From acetylene and from hydrocarbon gases derived from natural gas and other sources, an entirely new synthetic organic industry has been developed in the United States. Increased production of some of the derivatives has been extraordinary and accompanied with a pronounced decline in prices. One of the most important products is ethylene glycol, used as a partial substitute for glycerin in the manufacture of low-freezing dynamite and as an antifreeze in automobile radiators. Domestic consumption increased from 10,000 pounds in 1922 to nearly 12,000,000 pounds in 1927, while the price decline in that period was from $1 to 27 cents.

Paragraph 4. Alcohols: The phrase "all the foregoing whether primary, secondary, or tertiary," has been added in order to eliminate doubt as to the inclusion of the various types of each alcohol mentioned by name in paragraph 4. For example, there are at least 2 types of propyl alcohol, 4 types of butyl alcohol, and 8 types of amyl alcohol. The phrase "and mixtures in chief value of any one or more of the foregoing," has been added in order to prevent the evasion of duty by the addition of a small amount of another material which might result in the classification for the purposes of duty of this mixture in another paragraph at a lower rate.

The production of industrial alcohol (ethyl alcohol) exceeds in quantity and value that of any organic chemical. About 40 per cent of the output is consumed as an antifreeze for automobile radiators. Other important uses are in the cellulose industry (lacquers, pyroxylin, rayon, and films); as a solvent for shellac and varnish; in the preparation of pharmaceuticals, perfumes, and many other products. At the present time most of the alcohol is produced from blackstrap molasses, and smaller quantities from corn. That synthetic ethyl alcohol may become of commercial importance in the near future is indicated by a successful test of 30 days (in May) by one of the leading chemical companies, using as raw material one of the constituents of natural gas. Synthetic methyl, amyl, and propyl alcohols are already produced commercially on a large scale in this country.

Other non-coal-tar organic chemicals: Products showing great progress in recent years include citric and formic acids, and synthetic acetic acid and acetone. Domestic production of citric acid by fermentation of cane sugar, with the output of the California by-product citrus industry, has rendered the United States independent of foreign sources for acid and for raw materials. Under the act of 1922 the increase in imports of citric acid, chiefly in the form of duty-free lemon juice, was significant until 1927 and 1928, when the small lemon crop in Italy caused a shortage in Europe and a price for citric acid higher than in the United States. With a normal lemon crop in Italy indicated for this year, imports of citric acid either in the form of citrous materials or as a finished product, will probably again increase. The committee concurred in the House transfer of citrous juices to the dutiable list.

Late in 1928 the domestic production of formic acid was commenced by two manufacturers and marked the first output since 1923. A duty of 4 cents per pound on formic acid should permit the new industry to continue.

PARAGRAPH 7.—FIXED NITROGEN

The increase in world production of fixed nitrogen is one of the most remarkable postwar achievements of the chemical industry. Consumption of atmospheric nitrogen now exceeds that of Chilean nitrate of soda, formerly the chief source of supply. Although the United States entered this field somewhat later than European nations, the $50,000,000 thus far invested ranks synthetic nitrogen as one of the important chemical industries, with a capacity that will render us independent of Chilean nitrate of soda for nitric-acid manufacture. The availability of cheap nitrates and nitric acid is of great economic value to industry, to agriculture, and to national defense.

Request was made for a transfer to the free list of the ammonium compounds in paragraph 7 for fertilizer purposes. Such transfer was not made, however, for the following reasons: (1) Mixed fertilizers, including those containing ammonium compounds, are duty free, as, for example, nitrophoska. (2) For the 4-year period ending in 1928, 98.4 per cent of all fertilizer imports were entered duty free. (3) Urea, which has the highest nitrogen content of any commercial fertilizer material and is consumed in increasing amounts, had been transferred from the dutiable list to the free list.

PARAGRAPH 11.—SYNTHETIC RESINS

The only synthetic resins mentioned in the act of 1922 are those of coal-tar origin provided for in paragraph 28.

A specific provision for synthetic gums and resins not specially provided for has been made in this paragraph in order to cover a number of new synthetic gums and resins recently developed and now assuming commercial importance.

PARAGRAPH 19.—CASEIN

Provision has been made for "mixtures of which casein or lactarene is the component material of chief value not specially provided for," in order to prevent the evasion of the duty on casein by the importation of a mixture of casein and another ingredient under other paragraphs, as, for example, under paragraph 1459 (act of 1922) at 20 per cent ad valorem. The committee recommended an increase in the duty on casein from 2½ to 3½ cents per pound, in order that the dairy interests might derive some gain. Each year over 10,000,000,000 pounds of skimmed milk goes to waste, a portion of which might be converted into casein. Over half of the domestic consumption is supplied by imports. In granting an increase of no more than 1 cent per pound the committee considered the pronounced trend toward substitution of supercalendered for coated paper, in the production of which over 75 per cent of domestic consumption of casein was formerly used.

PARAGRAPHS 27–28.—COAL-TAR CHEMICALS

During the war and under the protection afforded by the present tariff act the growth of the coal-tar chemical industry was phenomenal. In 1913 a small quantity of domestic dyes had been produced almost exclusively from imported intermediates. In 1927 about 94 per cent by quantity and about 80 per cent by value of all dyes consumed in the United States were of domestic manufacture, and there was an exportable surplus of indigo and sulphur black.

Recent years have been characterized by sharp competition among domestic dye producers and by declining price levels for dyes—in fact, many now sell for less than in 1913. There has been a highly creditable development in the domestic output of vat and other fast dyes which hold a popular interest because of high fastness and ultimate economy in use.

Under the provisions of the tariff act of 1922 the original ad valorem rates in paragraphs 27 and 28 of 55 and 60 per cent, respectively, were reduced on September 22, 1924, to 40 and 45 per cent.

After careful consideration of the status of the coal-tar chemical industry and of the increase in imports of dyes, the committee recommended the retention of the provision for assessment of duties on the basis of American selling price on those products made in the United States, and of United States value (the selling price of the imported articles less certain statutory deductions), on those products not made in the United States.

Paragraph 27: Subparagraph (b) makes provision for carbolic acid, refined cresylic acid, meeting the prescribed tests, and phenol, at 20 per cent ad valorem and 3½ cents per pound, confirming the presidential proclamation on these products which reduced the rates from 40 per cent ad valorem and 7 cents to 20 per cent and 3½ cents per pound. In addition, three derivatives of cresol, namely, metacresol, orthocresol, and paracresol, were provided for at 20 per cent ad valorem and 3½ cents per pound.

Paragraph 28: The rates on synthetic indigo and sulphur black, the two important low-priced bulk colors, were reduced from 7 cents per pound and 45 per cent ad valorem to 3 cents and 20 per cent. For the 5-year period ending with 1928 these two dyes represented nearly 48 per cent by quantity and over 16 per cent by value of the total dye production, and the greater part of our export of dyes now consists of the two colors.

PARAGRAPH 31 (A) (1).—CELLULOSE ACETATE WASTE

The phrase "cellulose acetate rayon waste and other cellulose acetate waste" was stricken out of the House bill and "waste wholly or in chief value of cellulose acetate" inserted in lieu thereof. The new language is intended to cover the cellulose acetate waste resulting from the manufacture of blocks, sheets, rods, and other forms as well as from the manufacture of the above forms into finished articles. In addition, it is intended to cover the waste filaments, fibers, and yarns from cellulose acetate artificial silk.

PARAGRAPH 31 (B) (1).—PYROXYLIN SHEETS FOR SAFETY GLASS

A recent development of great promise in the pyroxylin industry is the production of transparent sheets of pyroxylin or celluloid for use in the manufacture of safety or nonshatterable glass for automobiles which consists of a sheet of transparent pyroxylin cemented between two layers of plate or sheet glass.

The duty on transparent sheets of pyroxylin (more than three one-thousandths of 1 inch in thickness and not more than thirty-two one-thousandths of 1 inch in thickness) was increased from 45 to 50 cents per pound. Other sheets of pyroxylin, whether transparent or not, will be dutiable under (b) (1) at 40 cents per pound.

PARAGRAPH 31 (C).—CELLULOSE SHEETS

Specific provision was given for sheets, bands, and strips (exceeding 1 inch in width but not exceeding three one-thousandths of 1 inch in thickness) whether known as cellophane or by any other name whatsoever. This material made from cellulose by the viscose or other process was not specifically provided for in the act of 1922. It has been subject to duty at various rates, first at 25 per cent, later at 60 per cent, and recently by a court decision at 40 cents per pound under paragraph 31.

PARAGRAPH 38.—ESTERS

Development of the new lacquers for automobiles, furniture, and for other uses was accompanied with enormous increases in production of such necessary solvents as butyl acetate and ethyl acetate. Butyl acetate, the more important, is produced from butyl alcohol made from corn by a fermentation process developed during the war. In 1928 it was reported that about 8,000,000 bushels of corn were consumed in its manufacture. During that same year imports of butyl acetate, dutiable under the act of 1922 at a lower rate than butyl alcohol, displaced nearly 800,000 bushels of corn. For that reason the committee concurred with the House in its increased rate of duty on butyl acetate.

PARAGRAPHS 53, 54, AND 55.—VEGETABLE OILS

Two opposing interests in the vegetable-oil industry were represented before the committee—the agricultural, requesting a 45 per cent ad valorem duty or the equivalent specific rate on all fats and oils, to increase the price level; and the soap makers, others consumers of inedible oils, and laundry interests, requesting free inedible vegetable oils to afford an adequate supply of raw materials. Coconut oil is predominantly the most important of imported vegetable oils and constitutes 47 per cent of our total imports of fats and oils (including the oil in copra). Over 99 per cent of the imported coconut oil enters free of duty from the Philippines, and the committee deemed it unwise to disturb existing relations with the islands by imposing a duty or by limiting imports. With this decision an increase in duty on other fats and oils was not considered advisable. Furthermore, drastic increases might reflect unfavorably on our large exportable surplus of edible fats, chiefly lard, which totals annually about 800,000,000 pounds, because of the transfer of foreign oils to markets now using domestic exported oil. Attention was called to the fact that there was also a deficit of more than 700,000,000 pounds of inedible oils used by the soap and inedible fat-consuming industries. In order to aid in supplying this deficit, without impairing the existing price level of edible oils and fats, the committee transferred sesame and sunflower-seed oils, when denatured so as to be unfit for edible purposes, from the dutiable list to the free list. A similar transfer was made of rapeseed oil, used chiefly in compounding lubricating oils, for which purpose it is not competitive with any oil produced in the United States.

The rate of duty on soy-bean oil was decreased from 5 cents per pound, as provided in the House bill, to 2.8 cents per pound but not less than 45 per cent ad valorem, which conforms with the request of the agricultural interests.

The rate of duty on linseed oil was decreased from 4.16 cents per pound in the House bill to 3.7 cents per pound to conform with the rate proclaimed by the President after investigation of production costs by the Tariff Commission. This rate allows a compensatory duty on flaxseed, the presidential proclamation rate for which was also recommended.

PARAGRAPH 58.—OIL MIXTURES

The phrase "but not less than the rate applicable to the component material subject to the highest rate of duty" inserted in H. R. 2667 was approved by the committee.

This will prevent the evasion of duty on an individual oil in paragraphs 53, 54, or 55, by importation of a mixture containing a small amount of another oil at the basket-clause rate of 25 per cent, as compared with the specific rate which, in many cases, is higher than the 25 per cent rate. An example is the importation of linseed oil containing a small amount of naphtha or soy-bean oil at 25 per cent, which is less than the specific rate on linseed oil. This mixture is suitable for practically the same uses as the pure linseed oil.

PARAGRAPH 62.—BATH SALTS AND TABLETS

Administrative difficulties in regard to the classification of bath salts and tablets under the act of 1922 have occurred. Medicinal salts and tablets have been classed under paragraph 5 at 25 per cent ad valorem, whereas perfumed bath salts and tablets have been classified under paragraph 62 at 75 per cent. The medicinal are ordinarily not perfumed. Specific provision has been given in the Senate bill for unperfumed at 25 per cent ad valorem and for the perfumed, whether or not having medicinal properties, at 75 per cent ad valorem.

SCHEDULE 2.—EARTH, EARTHENWARE, AND GLASSWARE

The committee has changed a number of the rates imposed under the bill passed by the House, of which 20 were increases and 30 were decreases. These changes include three commodities which have been transferred to the free list and three commodities which have been transferred from the free list to the dutiable list. The items transferred to the free list are silica, burrstones, and grindstones. Those transferred from the free list are statuary of plaster of Paris for presentation (without charge) to religious organizations; stained-glass windows for churches, valued at between $15 and $35 per square foot; and Venetian glass mosaics which are works of art. These changes reduced the equivalent ad valorem rate for the schedule as a whole from approximately 54.84 per cent to approximately 53.23 per cent, a decrease of 2.93 per cent.

Additional protection was given to a number of industries which by reason of changed conditions—manufacturing or competitive—subsequent to the enactment of the existing law have found it increasingly difficult to dispose of their products in the American markets in competition with the products of foreign producers. These include the brick, cement, tile, pottery, and glass industries, whose sales are largely affected by the competition in domestic markets from foreign sources.

PARAGRAPH 201.—COMMON BUILDING BRICK

Comparatively little foreign common building brick is used in this country except the brick, for the most part from Belgium, imported through the port of New York and used at that point. The imported brick competes almost wholly with the similar product made in the Hudson River district of New York, the only important source of supply of the domestic brick for New York City. The importation of brick free of duty enables importers to sell the foreign product in that market at a price considerably below the price at which the domestic producers would have to sell in order to manufacture at a profit. Because of comparatively high transportation costs imported brick does not move to inland points, and accordingly the proposed duty of $1.25 per thousand would not affect the prices for that commodity at points distant from the seaboard. It would, however, benefit the producers in the Hudson River district who sell practically their total output in New York City.

PARAGRAPH 202.—EARTHEN TILE

A considerable proportion of the wall tile imported consists of articles known as strips and trim tiles. Such articles also constitute an important part of the domestic production of glazed-wall tile. Because of the comparatively low selling prices in the United States of the imported commodities the sales of the domestic articles have been considerably curtailed, with a resultant decline in employment of American workmen. Comparisons of the selling prices of comparable domestic and imported articles indicates that the rates of duty under the existing law do not adequately protect the American industry. The increases in rates have been given in order to more nearly equalize the selling prices of the competing domestic and foreign commodities in important seaboard markets.

PARAGRAPH 205.—CEMENT

Because of comparatively high transportation costs in this country, imported Portland cement competes with the domestic product principally at American seaboard points, and the domestic cement plants most affected by the competition from foreign sources are those adjacent to the seaboard which ordinarily supply seaboard markets. Ninety per cent or more of the imports, for the most part from Belgium, are entered free of duty. The great bulk of the imports has been sold in a relatively few important markets on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, and importation free of duty has enabled importers to undersell the domestic producers at these points. The prices for domestic cement in these markets—in most instances considerably lower than the prices prevailing at points distant from the seaboard—indicate that the American producers have found it necessary to materially reduce their prices in order to dispose of their product in such markets. A duty of 8 cents per 100 pounds, which is equivalent to 30.4 cents per barrel, is imposed in order to more nearly equalize the spread between the prices of the competing domestic and foreign products.

PARAGRAPH 207.—ACTIVATED EARTH

A specific provision has been made in this paragraph for earths artificially activated with acid or other material. Such earths are usually treated with sulphuric or hydrochloric acid. This provision does not include within its scope earths which have been activated solely by the application of heat.

PARAGRAPHS 211–212.—EARTHENWARE AND CHINA TABLEWARE

There has been considerable unemployment in the tableware branch of the domestic pottery industry in recent years, and competitive conditions indicate that the industry is in need of additional protection. The domestic producers are finding it increasingly difficult to compete in price with the foreign producers of the less expensive grades of ware. For such wares the present rates of duty do not afford the American industry adequate protection, and accordingly the rates have been increased for articles which constitute the great bulk of the sales in this country of comparatively inexpensive pottery.

Under the provisions of paragraphs 211 and 212 a specific rate of duty, in addition to the ad valorem rates provided therein, is imposed upon plates, cups, or saucers valued at not more than 50 cents per dozen and upon cups and saucers imported as units valued at not more than 50 cents per dozen units. The specific rate is 10 cents per dozen for plates, cups, or saucers, or 20 cents per dozen units, each unit consisting of a cup and saucer.

GLASS AND GLASSWARE

The rates of duty imposed upon common window glass and plate glass are, in effect, practically those proclaimed by the President in accordance with the findings of the Tariff Commission in its investigations of the differences in costs of production of comparable and competing domestic and foreign products.

Increased rates of duty were imposed upon glass globes and shades because the rates imposed upon such articles under existing law enabled importers to undersell domestic producers in important markets.

The increased rate for chemical and scientific glassware was imposed in order to encourage the production in this country of articles which are necessary in time of war. Prior to 1914 the United States depended almost wholly upon foreign producers for the supply of such glassware. American manufacturers now supply a considerable proportion of the domestic requirements, and the American industry can be maintained if it is adequately protected.

Machine production of glass bottles has for the most part displaced the older hand-blown method of production, and those produced by the latter method consist of types which have not as yet been successfully made by machines. An increased rate has been imposed upon bottles used as containers of perfume and toilet preparations in order to perpetuate an industry which is practically the only source of employment for the comparatively few highly skilled glass-bottle blowers remaining in the trade.

Specific provision has been made in paragraph 218 (b) for gauge glass tubes wholly or in chief value of glass. Such articles consist of glass tubes for use on boilers, and in this connection are for the most part known as water-gauge glasses or tubular-gauge glasses.

Paragraph 220 is a new provision inserted by the House providing for a rate of 60 per cent ad valorem on laminated glass and manufactures thereof. This is an increasingly important industry. One of the chief products of this industry dutiable under this paragraph is automobile windshields made with sheets of glass laminated with pyroxylin.

Paragraph 221 removes the plate-glass duty from rolled, cylinder, crown, and sheet glass, wholly or partly ground, for the purpose of ornamentation (even though such ornamentation constitutes obscuration). Such glass (except rolled glass) is subjected to the additional duty of 5 per cent provided in paragraph 224. Rolled and sheet glass less than one-fourth but not less than one-eighth of 1 inch in thickness, when obscured in any manner (except by grinding for the purpose of ornamentation) has been subjected to the plate-glass rate. Cylinder and crown glass not less than one-eighth of 1 inch in thickness when obscured in any manner (except by grinding for the purpose of ornamentation) has been subjected to the plate-glass rate.

The proviso in paragraph 230 (b) is stricken out as unnecessary in view of a decision of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals (Bonwit, Teller & Co.) the holding of which is to the same effect as the proviso inserted by the House.

Schedule 3.—Metals and Manufactures of

This schedule comprises 99 paragraphs, many of which provide for a great number of diverse products and industries. Most paragraphs provide for products or groups of products which bear little economic relation to the products in other paragraphs of the schedule, so that the diversity of factors to be considered in providing adequate phraseology and rates is vast.

Since the passage of the House bill much new information has become available, which in a considerable number of paragraphs permits more accurate evaluation of competitive conditions than was possible by the House of Representatives. Consequently a substantial number of revisions have been made in the House bill, with a view to clarifying the language, facilitating administration of the act, and making adjustments in rates. The committee's changes of the House bill effect in this schedule about 40 upward revisions of individual rates and over 60 downward revisions, including items transferred to or from the free list.

Items transferred to the free list were: Manganese ore, muzzle-loading firearms, hoes, rakes, metal parts of typewriters, zinc dross, zinc skimmings, and nickel oxide. Articles made dutiable were: Cream separators valued at more than $40 but not more than $50 each, and milk cans. Certain items were specifically mentioned to avoid litigation over classification or to effect changes in the rates now imposed and to provide separate statistical classifications.

A tentative calculation shows that the result of the readjustment is an equivalent ad valorem rate for schedule 3, based on imports during 1928 and taking into account transfers to and from the free schedule, of about 33 per cent. This compares with an equivalent ad valorem of 39.6 per cent in the House bill and 35.07 per cent when the rates of the tariff act of 1922 are applied. The decrease in revenue in the present bill from the House bill is about 17 per cent and from the act of 1922 about 6 per cent.

Iron and steel

A few changes were made in the iron and steel schedule by which the present classification of hammer, mill, and roll scale is confirmed, and the rates on structural shapes and sheet piling were increased to conform to the rates on tonnage products which meet substantially less competition from imports. Brackets determined by values less than any foreign prices of steel during recent years have been merged with the next higher brackets to facilitate administration and avoid the possibility of undervaluation, such changes resulting in negligible alterations in rates. A slight increase was also made in the rate on pig iron.

Reductions have been made in the rate of duty on sponge iron, a new product, and in the rates on chromium steels. In addition, all duties in the steel schedule have been reduced by an amount compensatory both for the transfer of manganese ore to the free list and for reductions in the rates on manganese alloys.

Nonferrous metals

Advances in research and in the development of new products since the tariff act of 1922 resulted in a more comprehensive treatment of alloys in the House bill. There are, however, a number of products of the rare metals which were not adequately provided for in the House bill, and a revision of a few of the rates appeared warranted. As a result of this committee's study of the subject, manganese ore was transferred to the free list and the rates on manganese alloys reduced in proportion. The rates on tungsten ore, alloys of silicon and aluminum, chromium and its alloys, and cerium metal and its alloys were decreased. Reclassification of tantalum and its alloys and the addition of carbides of tungsten and molybdenum and products composed of these metals results in some instances in increases in rates. Nickel oxide was transferred to the free list, as were zinc dross and skimmings. A sliding scale, based on New York market prices, was introduced for antimony metal, with rates designed to exercise a stabilizing influence on prices which have shown marked fluctuations during postwar years. It is thought that the present bill provides adequately for nonferrous metals and their derivatives and that the phraseology and rate structure is sufficiently comprehensive to provide equitable rates for products most likely to be developed within the next few years.

Machinery and vehicles

Among the products of the industries in this group there are certain articles produced and sold under conditions which warrant raising or lowering the rates regarded as adequate protection for the majority. The most important example is that of passenger automobiles. The strong position of the American industry in the world's markets warrants a reduction in duty. Other examples of this class are printing, bookbinding, and paper-box machinery, and the products of the electrical industry. Among industries which were found to be operating under special handicaps, justifying an increased duty, are those making meat grinders and escalators.

Watches and clocks

Following analyses by witnesses of a number of the rates in the House bill, the committee has made a number of changes in the paragraphs providing for watches and clocks. The rates on watch movements have been readjusted downward, while the rates on parts have been greatly reduced. The present paragraph permits entry of repair parts at the rates now in effect, removes the possibility of assessing extremely high equivalent ad valorem rates, and permits the importation of incomplete mechanisms at somewhat lower duties than would be assessed on complete movements. The agreement of about 75 per cent of the watch importers to the rates incorporated on watches in this bill is a substantial guaranty that such rates are not excessive. The rates on complete clocks and clockwork mechanisms remain unchanged, but there have been drastic reductions in the rates on parts and incomplete mechanisms for the same reasons that changes were made in the rates on watch parts and incomplete watches. The rates in these two paragraphs constitute substantial increases over the present tariff act, but it is believed that they will not result in any increases in prices to the consumer, as an increase in domestic production will result in costs which will leave a reasonable profit at present prices.

Hardware and tools and miscellaneous manufactures of metal

While the rates provided in the House bill for this group of industries have been approved as to their general level, some revisions have been made where further information has disclosed exceptional conditions indicating maladjustments or inconsistencies in rates or classification.

Upholsterers' nails, thumb tacks, and paper-fastening staples were found to be inadequately provided for by the specific duty applicable to coarser products of the same general class. Increases were also made in the rates on hinges, bells, mechanics' hand tools, and the cheaper grades of pocketknives, products meeting severe competition from foreign goods of the lowest grades. Additional protection was provided on certain grades of shotguns, similar guns being made abroad and sold here in large numbers in competition with an industry essential to the national defense.

Rates on many articles were reduced—for example, pliers, crochet needles, pens, decorative metal products, and lighting fixtures. Removal from the general basket clause of most of the items regarding which adequate data were available warranted a slight reduction in the rates on metal manufactures not specially provided for.

Following is a discussion, by paragraphs, of the changes in phraseology made by this committee, and the reasons therefor; also discussion of such changes made by the House of Representatives and approved by this committee.

Paragraph 302.—Alloys

Subparagraph (a): Manganese ore and concentrates are transferred to paragraph 1713 of the free list.

Subparagraph (f): Tungsten powder is mixed with powdered carbon and fired in a furnace to effect a change to tungsten carbide, and the carbide is again powdered before causing its agglomeration into solid shapes. The carbon may be present in variable proportions and may be constituent either as an alloy, metalloid, or chemical compound. It is intended that the carbide powder shall be subject to the same rate of duty as the uncarburized tungsten powder.

Subparagraph (i): Silicon aluminum and aluminum silicon are alloys containing not over 10 per cent iron and not over 90 per cent silicon or 90 per cent aluminum. They are used in nonferrous metallurgy, chiefly for the casting of aluminum.

Similar alloys if containing over 90 per cent silicon are impure silicon metal used generally in casting aluminum, and provided for in paragraph 302 (h), and if containing over 90 per cent aluminum are impure aluminum metal used generally in deoxidizing steel, are considered as aluminum rather than as alloys, and are provided for in paragraph 374.

Alsimin is a trade name for and will be dutiable as ferrosilicon aluminum or ferroaluminum silicon alloys containing over 10 per cent iron and used generally in the metallurgy of steel.

Subparagraph (m): Tantalum and its specified alloys, when in nonductile form only, are intended to be covered in this group, as the ductile forms are provided for in subparagraph (q). Mechanical treatment such as rolling, drawing, or forging is generally required to develop the ductility of metals, and the absence of such treatment as shown by the shape of the metal may be taken as sufficient evidence of its nonductility.

Subparagraph (q): Columbium and niobium are synonymous terms. Only ductile columbium metal or alloys are here included and may be distinguishable from the nonductile as shown heretofore.

PARAGRAPH 303

Pieces of muck bars, except crop ends, have been specifically provided for in this paragraph where they are now dutiable but not mentioned by name; the crop ends of such bars are dutiable at the rates provided for iron and steel scrap in paragraph 301.

PARAGRAPH 304

The phrase "alloys not specially provided for used as substitutes for steel in the manufacture of tools" was deleted from this paragraph by the House bill. Such commodities are dutiable under the provisions of paragraph 302, or, if in the form of tools, under paragraph 352.

Concrete reinforcement bars, not heretofore mentioned in tariff acts, have been specifically mentioned to avoid conflict with paragraph 312 as structural shapes.

PARAGRAPH 305

Subparagraph (b): Provides for deductions from the duties provided in 16 paragraphs, designated by number, on steel and articles of steel, such reductions being compensatory for the transfer of manganese ore to the free list and reductions in duties made on manganese alloys in paragraph 302.

PARAGRAPH 312

The term "building forms" has been deleted from the paragraph as being redundant and of uncertain meaning. No change in classification is involved.

PARAGRAPH 316

Subparagraph (b): This subparagraph is designed to cover articles which have been given a predetermined shape or form, as well as scrap.

No conflict with the provisions for alloys or powders in paragraph 302 is anticipated because those products are characteristically used in various metallurgical processes, whereas the shapes provided for in paragraph 316 (b) are used to manufacture such products as cutting tools, lamp filaments, and parts of electrical equipment.

PARAGRAPH 317

The wire fencing and wire netting covered by the committee amendment is of the kind chiefly used for fencing poultry, for stucco work, and as reinforcing for automobile tops, and is dutiable under the 1922 act and under the House bill under the basket clause of the metal schedule.

PARAGRAPH 318

The committee adopts without change a clause inserted in this paragraph by the House to provide for wire cloth used in paper-making machines, now dutiable by court decision in paragraph 372 of the act of 1922 as parts of machines.

PARAGRAPH 319 (B)

The manufacture of the articles mentioned in this subparagraph requires special equipment such as is used in the manufacture of heavy ordnance.

The committee amendment excludes from the articles included in this subparagraph all castings. The House provision excepted only castings provided for in paragraph 327. The provision that measurement shall be made at the largest inside diameter is inserted to avoid ambiguity in cases where the article has a varying cross section.

PARAGRAPH 338

The provision for wood screws is stricken out with the intention of transferring these screws to classification as manufactures of metal not specially provided for under paragraph 398.

PARAGRAPH 353

Electrical machinery and apparatus is now dutiable chiefly under several paragraphs, as follows: Paragraph 372 as machinery, paragraph 399 as miscellaneous manufactures of metal, paragraph 368 as meters, and paragraph 339 as household utensils. Litigation over the meaning of the term "machine" as applied to electrical equipment has resulted in transferring some products to the machinery paragraph and leaving similar products classified under paragraph 399. In many cases the more highly manufactured articles have thus been subjected to the lower rates, and in other cases products of similar character have been declared dutiable at different rates. All these products, with the exception of such as are household utensils, lighting fixtures, or laboratory instruments, are now grouped together at a single rate.

The insertion of the words "other than laboratory" after the provision for electrical instruments is to avoid conflict with the provision for laboratory instruments in paragraph 360.

Certain types of electrical meters contain a clock, which drives a drum or disk. Such clockwork mechanisms, usually not made by the electrical firms, are made dutiable separately as clocks under paragraph 368. Simple trains of small gears, used in other types of meters, remain as integral parts of the electric meter, and are meant to be dutiable therewith.

It is not intended that this paragraph should include lighting fixtures, provided for in paragraph 387 of the House bill and eliminated therefrom by the Senate committee.

PARAGRAPH 360

The designation "philosophical" as applied to instruments, apparatus, etc., is stricken out as being of uncertain meaning, whereas the intention is sufficiently and better covered by the words "scientific and laboratory," and "surveying and mathematical."

PARAGRAPH 364.—MUZZLE-LOADING FIREARMS

The provision for muzzle-loading muskets, shotguns, rifles, and parts thereof is stricken out, and these articles are transferred to paragraph 1723 in the free list.

PARAGRAPH 364.—BELLS

The exception of church bells and carillons from the provisions of the paragraph is intended to limit its application to metal bells of common commercial usage such as bicycle bells, doorbells, annunciators, and gongs. Carillons are specially provided for in paragraph 1541, whereas church bells are not now specially provided for but are covered by the provision of paragraph 398 for manufactures of metal not specially provided for.

PARAGRAPH 365

The words "double or single barreled breech-loading and repeating" are stricken out as surplusage. All muzzle-loading guns are specially provided for in paragraph 1723.

PARAGRAPH 367.—WATCHES

Subparagraph (a): All time-keeping, time-measuring, or time-indicating mechanisms, not designed to be worn on or about the person, if less than 1.77 inches wide have been transferred to paragraph 368 (clocks).

Watch movements designed to be worn on the person more than 1.7 inches in width have been transferred to paragraph 368 (clocks).

Subparagraph (a) (3): Redrafting this subparagraph and changing the rates results in the application of duties for jewels in the form of a flat rate for mechanisms having one but not more than seven jewels and for the assessment of specific rates for every jewel contained in the two specified classes of mechanisms having more than seven jewels.

Subparagraph (a) (4): The presumption in the House bill that certain mechanisms have three adjustments and be assessed for each adjustment, whether the mechanism actually is adjusted or not, has been removed. Under the committee amendment adjustments will be dutiable only if marked.

Subparagraph (a) (5): The change in phraseology broadens the scope of the paragraph to include other devices than self-winding mechanisms, such as 8-day springs, which might be substituted, after importation, in a mechanism containing a spring barrel slightly larger than that necessary for a usual 1-day spring.

Subparagraph (b): The phraseology appearing in the act of 1922, but deleted in the House bill, requiring that the number of jewels in any of the mechanisms dutiable hereunder shall be marked in both letters and numbers, has been restored with a view to discouraging possible alterations in the marking of bridges after importation. The committee amendment removes the requirement of the act of 1922 and of the House bill that watches which have not been adjusted shall be marked "unadjusted." The change permits the importation of unadjusted watches without marking respecting adjustments.

Subparagraph (c) (1): The new language is introduced to permit the importation at the present rates of duty of a sufficient quantity of individual pieces and of subassemblies, consisting of two or more parts or pieces of material joined together, to supply normal requirements for replacement parts.

Subparagraph (c) (2): The subparagraph is expanded to include a mandatory assessment for those pillar or bottom plates for which a definite determination of the jeweling and adjustment of the complete mechanism can not be made.

Subparagraph (c) (3): The subparagraph is completely rephrased, substituting a specific rate for each piece (with certain exceptions) in any subassembly or incomplete mechanism instead of assessing each subassembly or incomplete mechanism (as was done in the House bill) at the full rate of the mechanism for which suitable. Pillar or bottom plates if appearing in a subassembly are dutiable at the rates provided for such plates, while the other parts in the subassembly are dutiable under this clause. As in the House bill, bimetallic balance wheels are dutiable as one piece of material, as well as mainsprings with riveted ends.

Subparagraph (c) (4): This clause is intended to include all individual parts or pieces of metal or other material if imported unattached to other pieces or parts and not imported under the provisions of subparagraph (c) (1) except jewels, set or unset. The purpose of the clause is to encourage the importation of individual parts, for assembly on a factory basis in the United States, instead of the importation of incomplete mechanisms and subassemblies which can usually be assembled without factory equipment and with a minimum of labor.

Subparagraph (d): The paragraph has been restricted to unset jewels to avoid the possibility of importing set jewels, which are a subassembly, at the rate of duty hereunder instead of at the rates provided in subparagraph (c) (3).

Subparagraph (e): The phraseology respecting dials has been changed to restrict the application of the subparagraph to dials suitable for the mechanisms now included within the scope of this paragraph. Striking out the words "attached to the foregoing" permits the entry, without separate assessment, of dials attached to complete mechanisms. This is the present tariff status of such dials.

Subparagraph (f): The new phraseology insures that cases for any mechanism, device, or instrument dutiable under this paragraph shall be assessed hereunder regardless of the condition in which imported and definitely excludes light containers used as shipping containers and which have no use as permanent cases for mechanisms.

Subparagraph (f) (4): The scope of this clause is broadened to include cases made of nonmetallic materials.

Subparagraph (f) (5): The wording is changed to include colored cases as a preventive of evasions through decorating cases with other materials than enamels.

Subparagraph (f) (6): This is a new clause providing rates for incomplete cases and parts of cases in order to prevent their classification in other paragraphs, as, for example, in paragraph 398 as manufactures of metal, n. s. p. f.

PARAGRAPH 368.—CLOCKS

Subparagraph (a): Phraseology is added specifying the value of synchronous and subsynchronous motors to be dutiable hereunder at not more than $3 each, exclusive of the value of gears or other attachments. The intention is to retain in this paragraph all motors used to drive ordinary electrical clocks, and to transfer to paragraph 353 synchronous motors of less than one-fortieth horsepower, such as are used in time switches and other electrical devices containing some form of clockwork mechanism.

Striking out the words "or electricity" is for the purpose of transferring electricity meters to paragraph 353 for assessment thereunder. The words "and the clockwork mechanism contained in any electrical device" are inserted for the purpose of retaining in this paragraph any clockwork mechanism which may be incorporated in any electrical device. The clockwork mechanisms are intended to be assessed separately hereunder, while the electrical devices minus the value of the clockwork mechanisms are intended to be assessed under paragraph 353.

Subparagraph (b): The words "or substitutes therefor" are stricken out as redundant in view of the definition of jewels in paragraph 367 (i).

Subparagraph (c): The words "except dials, cases, containers, and housings" are stricken out as they are specially provided for in subparagraphs (d) and (e) of this paragraph.

Subparagraph (c): Provides, instead of the provisions of the House bill, for—

(1) Entry at the present rate of sufficient repair parts for replacement purposes;

(2) Provision for mandatory assessment of plates which can not be definitely classified, preventing their classification in other provisions;

(3) Rates on subassemblies not containing plates, preventing the assessment of prohibitive ad valorem rates;

(4) Rates on subassemblies containing plates permitting entry of mechanisms at somewhat lower rates than would be assessed upon assembled mechanisms; and

(5) A provision for individual pieces or parts of metal or other material for factory assembly in the United States at still lower rates.

PARAGRAPH 369.—AUTOMOBILES

Subparagraphs (a) and (b) are intended to distinguish between large trucks and busses of small-scale production on the one hand and passenger cars of mass production on the other.

Glass parts of automobiles have been excluded from this paragraph to prevent importation of windshields and windows at rates lower than those provided for glass in Schedule 2.

PARAGRAPH 370.—AIRPLANES AND MOTOR BOATS

The definition of motor boats inserted is that used in the revenue act of 1928 and which applied only to the tariff act of 1922.

PARAGRAPH 372.—MACHINES

The word "reciprocating" has been stricken out before the words "steam engines" and the separate provision for steam turbines eliminated, thus returning steam turbines to classification with steam engines.

Provision for full-fashioned-hosiery knitting machines has been eliminated, making these machines dutiable as knitting machines, not specially provided for.

Separate mention of punches, shears, and bar cutters has been stricken out, thus making such machines dutiable as machine tools.

The term "meat and food grinding or cutting machines" is intended to include the familiar type of hand crank operated household food cutter, and larger sizes such as are used in butcher shops for grinding meat, formerly classified in paragraph 339 as household utensils.

Escalators, dutiable under the House bill as machines not specially provided for, have been given separate classification.

Porcelain parts of machines have been included in this paragraph. Under the House bill they were subject to disproportionately high specific duties designed primarily for chemical and household porcelain in Schedule 2.

PARAGRAPH 373

Striking out the words "forks, hoes, rakes," was intended to relegate hoes, rakes, and forks, except forks now classified in paragraph 355, to classification as agricultural implements in paragraph 1604.

PARAGRAPH 376.—ANTIMONY

The provision that the New York price which determines the rate of duty shall be that quoted for "ordinary brands" is intended to furnish an indication of the price at which most antimony is sold. Special brands which enjoy a price bonus, or impure brands which are offered at a discount, are not intended to have any bearing on the price which determines the rate of duty. The term "ordinary brands" is commonly used in the trade and in the publication of price quotations.

PARAGRAPH 382

All metal powders used in pigments are called bronze powders. The wording is changed to distinguish between such powders of aluminum and of other metal. The wording "aluminum bronze powder" is further intended to apply only to aluminum powder for use in pigments and not to powdered aluminum for metallurgical purposes.

PARAGRAPH 387.—LIGHTING FIXTURES

Provision for lighting fixtures has been eliminated with the intent of making them dutiable under the basket paragraph 398.

PARAGRAPH 387.—MILK CANS

Milk cans, not made of tin plate, are those which are in common use among dairies, and are made of sheet steel manufactured into cans and later coated with tin. The exception "not made of tin plate" is designed to avoid conflict with paragraph 311, which treats of articles made from tin plate.

PARAGRAPH 390

Nickel oxide is transferred to paragraph 1735 of the free list.

PARAGRAPH 395

The deletion of mention of zinc dross and skimmings is for the purpose of relegating such commodities to paragraph 1664 of the free list.

PARAGRAPH 396

Phraseology is added to this paragraph separating embossing rollers from the other articles mentioned to which the testimony showed they were not related or similar.

SCHEDULE 4.—WOOD AND MANUFACTURES OF

The changes made by the Finance Committee in Schedule 4 consist chiefly of transfers to the free list of such classes of lumber or logs as constitute raw materials for use in domestic manufactures or which are building materials largely used in agricultural districts. The former class includes logs of fir, spruce, cedar, or western hemlock, logs of various species of cabinet wood, and birch and maple lumber, (except flooring). The second class includes cedar lumber and shingles. A reduction is made in the rate of duty on bent-wood furniture and small increases in the rate on a few manufactured articles.

Logs of fir, spruce, cedar, or western hemlock are imported only into the Puget Sound district of the Pacific Northwest. Domestic sawmills and shingle mills in that region which are not supplied with timberlands are dependent in part for raw materials on imported logs. The cost of production of domestic logs with which the imported logs compete is not materially different from the cost of producing and towing Canadian logs to domestic markets.

Logs of cabinet woods are not produced in the United States. The domestic sawmills producing mahogany and other cabinet-wood lumber, veneers, and other products are entirely dependent upon imported logs.

Birch and maple lumber, except flooring, is in general imported for further conversion or utilization in domestic factories, for use in automobiles, and for similar manufacturing purposes.

Cedar lumber and shingles are closely related products. Imported shingles are in general of higher grades than the bulk of domestic production. On comparable grades Canadian and domestic costs of production are practically the same.

Beech flooring is transferred from the free list and included in the paragraph with birch and maple flooring, as commercial practice groups these three species of flooring.

The specific duty on spring clothespins is increased from 15 cents to 20 cents per gross because of the keen competition, especially on the West coast, offered by imported clothespins.

Paintbrush handles are specially provided for and given an increase in rate of duty of one-half of 1 cent per handle. This increase is made because of the fact that since the rate was reduced by presidential proclamation new competing countries have entered the import field.

A reduction is made in the rate on bent-wood chairs from 55 per cent to 40 per cent ad valorem, which is the rate provided for other furniture of wood. The 15 per cent differential was compensatory because of the duty provided by the House on birch and maple lumber. Since birch and maple lumber are restored to the free list, the Finance Committee regarded the compensatory rate on bent-wood chairs as unnecessary.

Molders' patterns of wood are eliminated from the wood schedule because specifically provided for in paragraph 327 as molders' patterns of whatever material composed.

The words "and flooring" are added in paragraph 403 to the provision for enumerated cabinet woods in the form of sawed boards, planks, deals, and all other forms not further manufactured than sawed. Flooring of one of the species of wood mentioned was held by the courts not to be covered by the provisions of this paragraph in the act of 1922, as it was further advanced than sawed. It was held to be free under paragraph 1700, act of 1922 (par. 1804, Senate bill). Since flooring of maple (except Japanese maple), birch, and beech is transferred to the dutiable schedule, it is intended that flooring of the cabinet woods mentioned also shall be dutiable.

The provision for "Furniture wholly or in chief value of rattan, reed, bamboo, osier, or willow * * *" in paragraph 408 is amended by adding the words "wholly or partly finished, and parts thereof." The intention is to cover unfinished furniture of the type mentioned, and parts of furniture, either where the complete article is imported in knocked-down condition, or where separate parts are imported, sufficient parts not being in one shipment to make a complete article.

The words "and parts thereof" are added in paragraph 411 to the provision for furniture wholly or in chief value of wood, and to the provision for bentwood furniture. The intention is as stated in connection with paragraph 408.

SCHEDULE 5.—SUGAR, MOLASSES, AND MANUFACTURES OF

The most important change in Schedule 5 made by the committee is the reduction in the proposed duty upon 96° sugar from Cuba from 2.4 cents per pound to 2.2 cents per pound. Other items than sugar in the schedule have not been greatly changed. No items in this schedule as it appears under the present law have been removed to the free list, nor have any items now on the free list been placed in this schedule by the Finance Committee.

The rates on all items in this schedule have received careful consideration and the changes made have been made with the interests of the consumers, producers, importers, and manufacturers in mind.

PARAGRAPH 501.—SUGAR, RAW AND REFINED

The language used in this paragraph is practically the same as the language used in the present law, but differs materially from the language used in the House bill. In the Senate bill, as in the present law, the rates progress by uniform steps from 75 to 100 sugar degrees, while the House bill doubles the increment of increase at 94°. The rate on 75° full-duty sugar in the Senate bill is 1.5425 cents per pound, and the rates progress by uniform steps from 75 to 100 sugar degrees, while 100°, making the 96° rate 2.75 cents per pound, and the 100°, or refined, sugar rate 2.98 cents per pound, a reduction of 0.25 cent per pound from the House rate on 96° sugar and 0.52 cent reduction in the House rate on 100° refined. These duties are 20 per cent less upon imports from Cuba.

The elimination of the double step-up at 94° was for the purpose of removing the premium that this double increase would place upon 94° sugar and for the purpose of producing a smaller differential between 96° sugar and refined sugar.

The rates of duty upon imports of sugar from Cuba, the source of practically all dutiable imports, under the present law and the House and Senate bills are as follows:

Sugar degrees	Present law	House bill	Senate bill
75	0.9920	1.25	1.234
96	1.7648	2.40	2.200
100	1.9120	2.80	2.384

Revenues on 1928 imports of sugar at the above rates: Present law, $117,153,997; House bill, $159,089,197; Senate bill, $146,042,782. Computed ad valorem rates: Present law, 72.64 per cent; House bill, 98.65 per cent; Senate bill, 90.56 per cent.

PARAGRAPH 502.—MOLASSES, EDIBLE AND INEDIBLE

The present law and the House bill separated molasses into two classes, edible and inedible. The Senate bill retains this classification and the same language, but reduces the House rate of 3.3 cents on edible molasses testing not above 48 per cent total sugars to 0.3 cent per gallon and reduces the increase of 0.6 cent per gallon for each additional per cent of total sugars above 48° to 0.33 cent per gallon, so that the increase in rate of duty on edible molasses above the rate in the present law corresponds to the increase in rate of duty on sugar in the Senate bill compared with the rate in the present law.

The imports of edible molasses or sirup are small, being annually less than 2,000,000 gallons. The domestic production of edible molasses amounts to two or four times as much, not including cane sirup totaling about 20,000,000 gallons annually, and refiners' sirup made from refined molasses, of which from 30,000,000 to 36,000,000 gallons are available annually.

Inedible molasses carries the same rate and the same language as in the House bill, and differs from the present law in placing the rate of duty upon total sugars present in the molasses in order to avoid the dilution of this commodity, as is done under the present law, so that it may be imported under the lowest rate of duty.

PARAGRAPH 503.—MAPLE SUGAR AND MAPLE SIRUP; DEXTROSE AND DEXTROSE SIRUP

The rate of duty on maple sugar is increased from 7½ cents per pound in the House bill to 9 cents per pound in order to offset the bonus which, witnesses stated, was being paid indirectly to the maple-sugar producers in Canada by the Canadian Government. The rate on maple sirup is raised to 6 cents per pound to correspond to the rate on maple sugar. The average quantity of sugar in maple sirup is about 7½ pounds per gallon, which at the rate of 9 cents per pound is 67.5 cents. One gallon of maple sirup weighs 11 pounds, which at the rate of 6 cents per pound carries a duty of 66 cents per gallon.

Under the present law the duty on 7½ pounds of sugar in 1 gallon of sirup is 30 cents, while the duty on 1 gallon of maple sirup is 44 cents. This discrepancy in rates on maple sugar and on maple sirup has resulted in the importation of a limited quantity of maple sirup compared with the importation of maple sugar. For example, the imports of maple sugar in 1928 amounted to about 7,000,000 pounds of maple sugar and only 36,000 gallons of maple sirup.

Rates of duty on maple sugar and sirup

	Present law (cents per pound)	House bill (cents per pound)	Senate bill (cents per pound)
Maple sugar	4	7½	9
Maple sirup	4	5	6

Dextrose and dextrose sirup were given the same rates as in the House bill (2 cents per pound). The combined imports are small, amounting to only 2,000 to 3,000 pounds annually, while the production runs into several hundred million pounds annually and exports total from 5,000,000 to 10,000,000 pounds of dextrose, and from 120,000,000 to 140,000,000 pounds of dextrose sirup, each year.

PARAGRAPH 504.—SUGAR CANE

The language in this paragraph is the same as in the House bill except that the rate of duty is reduced from $3 to $2 per ton. The rate in the present law is $1 per ton. No sugar cane is imported into continental United States but there are annually some importations of cane from Santo Domingo into Porto Rico, the revenues from which go into the Porto Rican treasury. These importations in 1928 amounted to 228,777 tons compared with 185,434 tons in 1927. It was suggested that $3 per ton might amount to an embargo, thus depriving Porto Rico of several hundred thousand dollars in revenues. For this reason the rate was reduced to $2 per ton. The sugar produced from this cane is imported into continental United States free of duty, and, therefore, a rate higher than $1 per ton of cane should be paid on raw material when shipped into Porto Rico.

PARAGRAPH 505.—RARE SUGARS AND LACTOSE

No changes are made in the language nor in the rates of duty in this paragraph compared with the House bill. In the present law lactose is included under "other saccharides," but in recent years its importance as a commercial commodity has so increased that it is desirable that it be specifically mentioned. The domestic production of lactose exceeds 4,000,000 pounds annually. Imports are not shown separately for the reason stated above, but an analysis of invoices at two of the principal ports of entry shows that several hundred thousand pounds of this commodity are imported annually into the United States.

PARAGRAPH 506.—CANDY AND CONFECTIONERY AND REFINED SUGAR WHEN TINCTURED OR COLORED

The language in this paragraph is changed from the wording in the House bill in order to take care of a possible importation of colored or tinctured sugar under the rate of 40 per cent ad valorem, after which the coloring material might be removed at small cost and the sugar sold as refined sugar, thereby avoiding the payment of a considerable part of the refined-sugar duty.

SCHEDULE 6.—TOBACCO AND MANUFACTURES OF PARAGRAPH 601.—WRAPPER TOBACCO

The House bill provided an increase from $2.10 to $2.50 per pound on unstemmed wrapper tobacco and from $2.75 to $3.15 on stemmed. Since imports are almost wholly in the unstemmed form to avoid breakage and loss in handling, the former rates are the effective ones.

The increase proposed of 40 cents per pound, equaling from 70 to 80 cents per thousand cigars, was considered too heavy an additional burden to put upon the 5-cent cigar industry. Consideration was also given the fact that thousands of farmers in the Connecticut Valley, in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and New York, are producing binder and filler tobacco used in 5-cent cigars, an essential part of which is the imported wrapper. Witnesses represented that should the rate on wrapper tobacco be increased 40 cents per pound, production of 5-cent cigars would be restricted and the market for domestic binder and filler tobacco be narrowed. In 1928 the duty on cigar wrapper approximately equaled 100 per cent ad valorem.

The phraseology of the paragraphs has been changed so as to provide a single rate of duty on all mixed bales containing over 5 and less than 35 per cent wrapper, thus making the provision more definite and facilitating its administration.

SCHEDULE 7.—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS AND PROVISIONS

Before agreeing upon the rates in Schedule 7, the committee gave careful consideration to the need for protection of the several agricultural industries and the possibilities of affording benefits to these industries by increased duties. In order to obtain additional evidence and to afford an opportunity as far as possible for all who were interested to be heard, the subcommittee on Schedule 7 conducted hearings extending from June 17 to 25. During these hearings, 262 interested parties submitted briefs or oral testimony.

The committee has agreed substantially to the considerable increases in rates on agricultural products provided by the House bill, which entailed an estimated increase in revenue from duties in this schedule of more than $25,000,000 or more than 40 per cent and an increase in the average of ad valorem equivalents from 23 to 34 per cent. Changes in this schedule as compareed with the House bill consist principally of adjustments based on the additional evidence submitted to the committee.

The changes are summarized below by groups of commodities:

PARAGRAPHS 701–706.—MEAT ANIMALS, MEATS, AND MEAT PRODUCTS

The rates fixed by the House bill for this group were generally accepted. The only change is the transfer of blood albumin from paragraph 1605 of the free list. Information submitted to the committee indicates a considerable increase in imports of blood albumin, and a comparison of the data before the committee shows that import prices are considerably below the domestic cost of production. To afford reasonable protection to the domestic producer, blood albumin has been made dutiable under paragraph 701 at rates which approximate the differences between domestic costs and import prices.

PARAGRAPHS 707–710.—MILK AND MILK PRODUCTS

The testimony submitted to the committee stressed the necessity of equalizing the rates on the several dairy products. The reasons for such an adjustment hinge upon the close relationship existing betwen these products both in regard to their production and their consumption. For many uses one product may be substituted for another. Thus condensed or evaporated milk may for many purposes be used in place of whole milk, powdered whole or skimmed milk is used instead of condensed milk, sweet butter is used instead of cream in ice-cream mixtures. On the other hand, the supply of milk in competing countries may be shifted more or less readily from the one to the other of these products and unless there is a balance between the several duties, there is danger that they may prove ineffective. On the basis of this principle the committee has adjusted the rates on the several dairy products so as to be compensatory to a rate of 14 cents per pound on butter. Butterfat is the constituent of chief value generally in dairy products; and since the price of butter most closely reflects the value of butterfat, butter was taken as the basic factor upon which adjustments were made.

PARAGRAPHS 711–713.—POULTRY AND EGGS

The rates on eggs and egg products in the House bill—substantial increases over existing law—are accepted. The committee increased the duty on dead poultry from 8 to 10 cents per pound and made a compensatory adjustment in the rate on live poultry from 6 to 8 cents. Consideration was given the fact that poultry is one of the most widely distributed of farm products and an important source of cash income for the farm family. The combined imports of live and dead poultry, valued at more than $2,000,000 in 1928, have been increasing.

PARAGRAPHS 717–721.—FISH AND FISH PRODUCTS

A seasonal change in duty is provided on "other fish, not specially provided for," in paragraph 717 (a), in order that a larger supply may be available during the winter months. From October 1 to May 1 the rate is fixed at one-half instead of 1 cent per pound.

The duty on "fish, dried and unsalted: Cod, haddock, hake, pollock, and cusk," provided for in paragraph 717 (c), has been reduced from 2½ cents per pound to 1¼ cents per pound, because the higher rate imposes an unnecessary tax on the consumers of this product.

In paragraph 719 (2) the duty on pickled or salted cod, haddock, hake, pollock, and cusk neither skinned nor boned when containing not more than 43 per cent of moisture has been reduced from 1¾ cents per pound to 1¼ cents per pound and the duty on the same product having a moisture content of more than 43 per cent has been reduced from 1¼ cents per pound to three-fourths cent per pound. These duties have been reduced because the manufacturers of boneless codfish and other salted cod products are unable to obtain the necessary supply of raw material from domestic sources.

The duty on pickled or salted cod, haddock, hake, and cusk, skinned or boned, provided for in paragraph 719 (3) has been reduced from 2½ cents per pound to 2 cents per pound because of the reduction of one-half cent per pound in the duty on the raw material provided for in paragraph 719 (2).

The duty on "clams, clam juice, or either, in combination with other substances, packed in air-tight containers," provided for in paragraph 721 (b) has been reduced from 35 per cent ad valorem to 20 per cent ad valorem in order to retard the depletion of the United States clam beds.

The duty on boiled fish roe, packed in air-tight containers, provided for in paragraph 721 (d), has been reduced from 20 cents per pound to 30 per cent ad valorem because of the low price of this product and because none of it is packed in the United States.

PARAGRAPHS 722–733.—GRAINS AND GRAIN PRODUCTS

The duties in the House bill were accepted on barley and barley products, buckwheat and buckwheat products, corn and corn products, macaroni and alimentary pastes, rye and rye products, wheat and flour, bran and screenings, cereal breakfast foods and biscuits.

The duty on oats, hulled or unhulled, was increased from 15 to 16 cents per bushel of 32 pounds in accordance with evidence submitted by the producers.

The rates in the House bill on rough and milled rice were reduced to the rates in the act of 1922 for the reason that the industry is on an important surplus basis, exports being approximately nine times as large as imports.

Soy-bean oil cake and meal, free under the act of 1922 and the House bill, were made dutiable in paragraph 730 at three-tenths cent per pound in order to encourage the production of soy beans in this country, especially in the corn-borer infested sections where soy beans have proved to be an important substitute for the corn crop.

PARAGRAPHS 734–750.—FRUITS AND FRUIT PRODUCTS

New provision is made for frozen berries which are made dutiable in paragraph 736 at 1¼ cents per pound if frozen without sugar and at 35 per cent with sugar added.

New provision is made in paragraph 737 for dried, desiccated, or evaporated cherries at 6 cents per pound. The rate is made compensatory to that on fresh cherries on the assumption that in ordinary practice 3 pounds of fresh cherries will make 1 of dried.

The provisions in the House bill for cherries, sulphured or in brine, with pits at 5½ cents per pound, and with pits removed at 9 cents per pound have been left unchanged except for a new provision providing that cherries which count 900 or more to the gallon, with pits shall be dutiable at 3 cents per pound and with pits removed at 4 cents. This provision has been inserted because of the inadequacy of the domestic supply of these small cherries. It will permit domestic preservers who have built up their business in part by the preserving and preparation of these small cherries to maintain that branch of their operations. New provisions have been made for frozen cherries to care for the new development of marketing fruits in that condition.

New provision is made in paragraph 740 for fig paste at the same rate as for dried figs.

In paragraph 741, the duty on dates, fresh or dried, with pits, has been increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound with a corresponding change from 35 per cent ad valorem to 5 cents per pound on prepared dates in order to protect the growing domestic date industry.

That portion of paragraph 742 referring to grapes in bulk, crates, barrels, etc., dutiable at 25 cents per cubic foot has been changed to read, "Grapes, in their natural state, or sulphured, 5 cents per pound, including the weight of containers and packing." Most of our imports consist of foreign high-priced grapes packed with filling material such as sawdust, cotton waste, or cork dust in small boxes weighing 25 pounds or less. The change in method of levying the duty is designed to facilitate entries. The increase in duty involved in the change is designed to assist that portion of our grape industry, particularly in California, which has developed a table grape mainly for winter consumption and which under present conditions must meet the competition of considerable imports of grapes arriving during the winter months.

In paragraph 743 the duty on lemons has been increased from 2 to 2½ cents per pound in order to aid in the orderly marketing of our lemon production in California which at present must face the competition of speculative entries of lemons from foreign countries. The duty on limes has been brought back to the rate in the tariff act of 1922 because domestic production is negligible. The rate on grapefruit was also made the same as the present rate because imports are declining and domestic production has remained fairly steady.

The duty on dried, desiccated, or evaporated prunes is increased from one-half of 1 cent to 2 cents per pound in order to make the rate comparable with those on other dried fruits, such as apricots, peaches, and pears and in order to give it a proper relation to the duty on prunes in the natural state.

In paragraph 750 the duty on candied, crystallized, or glacé fruits has been increased from 35 to 40 per cent ad valorem to make it consistent with the duty on confectionery. Fruit peels, crystallized or glacé, were transferred to paragraph 739 and made dutiable at 8 cents per pound.

PARAGRAPHS 751–753.—BULBS AND GREENHOUSE STOCK

The rates in paragraph 761 were changed back to those in the 1922 act. Most of the bulbs specifically mentioned in the act are used for greenhouse forcing. Domestic production of forcing types of these bulbs is negligible, except in the case of narcissus, being mainly of garden types. No change was made in other rates in this group.

PARAGRAPHS 754–759.—EDIBLE NUTS AND NUT PRODUCTS

In paragraph 755 the rate on Brazil nuts not shelled was reduced from 2 cents to 1 cent per pound, the rate in the act of 1922. A compensatory rate was put on shelled Brazil nuts of 3 cents per pound. There is no domestic production of these nuts. The rates on filberts, not shelled and shelled in the act of 1922 have been restored. The committee feels that the domestic production is so small at the present time that the supply will be dependent upon imports for a long time to come. Pignolia and pistache nuts have been replaced in this paragraph at the rate of 1 cent per pound as in the act of 1922. In the House bill they were stricken from the paragraph and thus fell in the basket paragraph 759 where the unshelled nuts would have been dutiable at 5 cents per pound and the shelled at 10 cents.

After careful consideration of the testimony offered and of other information available to the committee, the rate on shelled peanuts was reduced from 7 to 6 cents per pound, the rate recently proclaimed by the President as a result of an investigation of the differences in costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country.

The committee has restored the rates on pecans, unshelled and shelled, to 3 and 6 cents per pound, respectively, the rates in the act of 1922.

In paragraph 750 the committee has restored the phraseology of the act of 1922 making edible nuts, shelled or unshelled, n. s. p. f., dutiable at 1 cent per pound. The committee finds that nuts imported under this paragraph are of a distinct type not produced in the United States.

PARAGRAPH 760.—OIL-BEARING SEEDS

The House rate of 63 cents per bushel for flaxseed was decreased to 56 cents per bushel, the rate recently proclaimed by the President after investigation by the Tariff Commission of costs in the United States and the chief competing country.

PARAGRAPHS 760 AND 761.—GARDEN AND FIELD SEEDS

The rate on crimson clover was reduced from 2 cents to 1 cent per pound. About 90 per cent of the domestic consumption of this seed is imported. It is produced commercially in the United States only within a limited area. It appears that the interests of the many farmers sowing crimson clover seed outweighs that of the producers.

PARAGRAPHS 763–773.—VEGETABLES

The rate on mushrooms, fresh or dried, in paragraph 766 was increased to 10 cents per pound and 60 per cent ad valorem, and that on mushrooms, otherwise prepared or preserved, to 10 cents per pound on drained weight and 60 per cent ad valorem. These increases in rates on canned or preserved mushrooms are based on a comparison of domestic costs with the wholesale prices of the imported article.

Truffles are not produced in the United States and as they are believed not to seriously compete with mushrooms they were transferred to the free list.

In paragraph 770 the rate on tomatoes in their natural state was reduced from 3 to 2½ cents per pound, while that on prepared or preserved tomatoes was increased from 40 to 50 per cent ad valorem. These changes were made in accordance with the evidence before the committee concerning the needs of the producers.

The House bill rates were accepted for the items in paragraph 772 except that seasonal reductions were provided in the rates on eggplant and cucumbers. The varying seasonal rates are intended to benefit both the consumer and the producer since the lower rates permit imports to come in freely to supply the demand when domestic production is low and the higher rates tend to restrict the importation when the domestic-grown supply is increasing, thus preventing an oversupply in our markets with resultant unremunerative prices to domestic growers.

The duty on onions in paragraph 768 was increased from 2 to 2½ cents per pound upon evidence before the committee that the latter rate was necessary in order to allow western producers to compete with imports in the large eastern markets.

PARAGRAPHS 774–776.—COFFEE SUBSTITUTES, COCOA AND CHOCOLATE, GINGER ROOT

No important change was made in these paragraphs.

PARAGRAPHS 777 AND 778.—HAY, STRAW, HOPS

In accordance with evidence submitted showing the need for greater protection the duty on hay was increased from $4 to $5 per ton, the duty on straw from $1 to $1.50, and that on broomcorn from $10 to $25 per ton.

The duty on lupulin was increased from 75 cents to $1.50 per pound, to accord more nearly with the duty on hops.

PARAGRAPHS 779–780.—SPICES AND SPICE SEEDS, TEASELS

No changes were made in these paragraphs.

SCHEDULE 8.—SPIRITS, WINES, AND OTHER BEVERAGES

No changes have been made in any of the rates in this schedule as set forth in the House bill.

PARAGRAPH 806

A subparagraph has been added to apply to the importation for beverage purposes of concentrated fruit juices of the citrus fruits—lemons, limes, oranges, and grapefruit. The duty on concentrated citrus fruit juices shall be collected on the equivalent number of gallons of unconcentrated fruit juice represented by the importation. This is done so that the present rate of 70 cents per gallon will not be evaded by concentration, evaporation, or dehydration.

PARAGRAPH 814

A proviso has been added to this paragraph permitting wineries in the United States now engaged in the distillation of brandy for fortification purposes, to also distill nonbeverage alcohol to be employed in the manufacture of food products. The operation is to be conducted under such regulations as may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the alcohol will be subject to internal-revenue taxes similar to those now imposed on licensed distillers of alcohol. The provision is adopted as a measure of relief to grape growers and to wineries. The wineries now operate approximately 60 to 90 days a year on the distillation of brandy; under this provision they will be able to operate for longer periods and to use grapes as a raw material for the alcohol produced.

SCHEDULE 9.—COTTON MANUFACTURES

PARAGRAPH 902

The duty on cotton sewing thread is increased to provide additional protection to the domestic industry, and also with a view to preventing fine plied yarns, dutiable at higher rates under paragraph 901, being entered as thread under paragraph 902.

The duty on handwork cottons is increased because of the substantial imports, which are estimated to constitute 20 to 25 per cent of the domestic production in this line.

PARAGRAPH 904 (A)

The exception in this subparagraph of "woven-figured" (as in the act of 1922) is restored. This change, together with the reinsertion of woven-figured in subparagraph (c) insures a basic rate on unbleached cloths classed as woven-figured higher than that provided for unbleached cloths not woven-figured.

The minimum progressive specific provision is added to provide for unbleached cloths at the lower price end of each yarn-count group. The specific provisions in the act of 1922 were deleted in the House bill.

PARAGRAPH 904 (C)

The provision in this subparagraph for "woven-figured," (as in the act of 1922), is restored. This insures the application to unbleached and to bleached cloths, if classed as woven-figured, of higher rates of duty than would otherwise be applicable under subparagraphs (a) and (b), respectively. These cloths are in most cases more expensive to manufacture than cloths officially listed as not woven-figured. The insertion of the word "woven-figured" in this subparagraph has no effect on the rates of duty applicable to printed, dyed, or colored cloths.

PARAGRAPH 904 (E)

Additional cumulative duties are provided for certain fabrics in which the domestic industry is meeting keen competition from abroad, namely, on permanent-finished organdies, on surface prints, and on warp prints. On the two first named there is assessed additional duty of 10 per cent ad valorem and on the last named 25 per cent ad valorem. Permanent-finished organdies constituted the leading class of cotton cloths imported in 1928; these imports were principally from Switzerland, where the cloths, mainly of English origin, were given a finish permanent to washing. Domestic production is confined to three firms, two of which operate under a license from the owners of the Swiss patents. Imports of surface or relief printed cretonnes and other upholstery fabrics originate in England, France, and Germany. The domestic production of this type of printing is a recent development in this country and as yet is confined to three firms; additional duty appears to be needed to enable them to meet the prices of imported fabrics. The domestic production of warp-printed fabrics, particularly those used for upholstery, is also a fairly recent development in this country and one which appears to need a substantial increase in duty in order to meet the competition from abroad.

PARAGRAPH 904 (F)

A provision for a minimum duty of 5 cents a pound is inserted to provide for very low-priced coarse-yarn cloths on which the progressive rates might not be adequate.

PARAGRAPH 904 (G)

The duty which would apply to tire fabric, if subjected to the progressive rates for countable cotton cloths, is considerably lower than the single rate of 25 per cent ad valorem provided in the act of 1922. The provision of the act of 1922 is therefore restored.

PARAGRAPH 905

"Rayon or other synthetic textile" is substituted for "rayon" because of the change of wording of the definition given in paragraph 1313.

PARAGRAPH 908

The single ad valorem rate on tapestries and other Jacquard-figured upholstery cloths is replaced by four stepped rates based upon the picks per inch, as the cost of manufacture, other details being the same, varies directly with the number of filling threads per inch in the fabric. Imports throughout the entire range constitute a large proportion of the domestic consumption.

PARAGRAPH 911

The duty on blankets, not Jacquard-figured, has been increased to provide adequate protection against imports of low-grade goods.

PARAGRAPH 912

Candle wicking is specially provided for, and at the compound rate of the act of 1922, on the representation of the domestic industry that the ad valorem provision of the House bill would afford insufficient protection.

Woven labels for garments are advanced from 50 per cent ad valorem to 70 per cent ad valorem, owing to the fact that their manufacture requires the most expensive and complicated type of weaving, and that they are woven in large part of imported fine yarns and the resulting actual protection is much less than the apparent rate of duty.

PARAGRAPH 913

This paragraph has been divided into two brackets. Belts and belting for machinery have been reduced to 30 per cent ad valorem, the rate in the act of 1922, as no facts were brought forward at the hearings justifying any increase. The rate on rope used as belting for textile machinery is left at 40 per cent ad valorem, owing to appreciable imports selling below domestic costs.

PARAGRAPH 914

On cotton warp-knit fabric the rate of 55 per cent ad valorem provided in the act of 1922 is restored because manufacturers of cotton glove fabric, adversely affected by the decline in the domestic cotton glove industry, are developing a new type of fabric, in chief value of cotton but plated with rayon, for use in the manufacture of corsets and similar garments.

PARAGRAPH 915

"Finished or unfinished" are added in conformity to other paragraphs.

On cotton warp-knit fabric gloves the duty has been reduced from 60 to 30 per cent ad valorem because the higher rate, which is less than the existing rate, will not protect the domestic industry, which produced in 1928 only about 2 per cent of the domestic consumption, and will impose an unnecessary burden upon the consumers, principally women of moderate means.

On cotton knit gloves, other than warp-knit, the duty has been reduced, because of the small imports, from 50 to 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 916 (A)

The new wording and rate are intended to embrace infants' hosiery retailing per pair at 50 cents or more, a class in which the domestic manufacturer can not now compete.

PARAGRAPH 916 (C)

A new provision is added to exclude cotton hosiery in part of rayon or other synthetic textile. (See par. 1309.)

PARAGRAPH 919

On shirts of cotton, which are given specific mention, the duty has been increased from 37½ to 50 per cent ad valorem because of the contentions of domestic manufacturers that imports are increasing and that the 37½ per cent ad valorem rate is less than the ad valorem rates imposed on fine cotton cloths used in the manufacture of high-grade shirts.

PARAGRAPH 921

The rate of duty on "hit-and-miss" rag rugs is increased to 75 per cent ad valorem because this is approximately the equivalent of the present rate of 35 per cent ad valorem based upon the American wholesale selling price, which was proclaimed by the President after a cost investigation by the Tariff Commission. The duty on chenille rugs is reduced, because of the small imports, from 45 per cent ad valorem to the 35 per cent ad valorem under which they are dutiable, in paragraph 1022 of the act of 1922, as cotton rugs not specially provided for.

PARAGRAPH 922

The provision for "Rags wholly or in chief value of cotton, except those chiefly used in paper making" cancels the provision for "Cotton wiping rags" in paragraph 1555 of the House bill. These cotton rags are of low value, and the increase in the duty from 2 to 3 cents a pound tends to protect domestic wiping rags made from specially woven fabrics and also the domestic cotton-yarn waste (heretofore largely employed for wiping machinery, etc.) which has been increasingly supplanted by imported rags from Japan.

SCHEDULE 10.—FLAX, HEMP, JUTE, AND MANUFACTURES OF

PARAGRAPH 1001

The duty on hemp is increased to further encourage the domestic production of this fiber.

PARAGRAPH 1004

The duty on flax, hemp, and ramie yarns, threads, twines, and cords is changed from a specific to an ad valorem basis for the reason that the specific duties have proved to be inequitable. The inequality is evident from the fact that there are several qualities of yarn of the same size, or count, and the values per unit vary widely between the highest and the lowest grades. A somewhat similar variation in quality exists in threads, twines, and cords. The application of one specific rate of duty resulted in an ad valorem equivalent much higher on the low-quality, low-priced goods than on the high-quality, high-priced goods.

PARAGRAPH 1005

The rate on hard-fiber cordage is reduced for the reason that imports (exclusive of entries from the Philippine Islands) of all hard-fiber cordage are small in relation to domestic consumption.

PARAGRAPH 1006

The wording is changed for the purpose of rendering this paragraph consistent with paragraph 1004 (b).

PARAGRAPH 1009

The duty on artists' canvas is reduced, because the higher rate would tend to increase the price of canvas to art students.

PARAGRAPH 1014

The duty on towels and napkins of flax, hemp, or ramie, containing more than 120 threads and not more than 160 threads to the square inch, is increased for the reason that the domestic industry has extended its production of these articles to those containing over 150 threads to the square inch.

PARAGRAPH 1016

The duty on handkerchiefs with hand-rolled or hand-made hems is increased to encourage Porto Rican production of these articles.

SCHEDULE 11.—WOOL AND MANUFACTURES OF

The most important changes made in Schedule 11 by the committe are the reduction in the duty upon the clean content of clothing and combing wool from 34 to 31 cents per pound, a proportionate reduction in the compensatory duties on wool products and the elimination of the two lowest duty brackets for many of the wool products. These changes are considered in some detail below.

PARAGRAPH 1101

Haslock and Kerry are added to the named main types of carpet wools in the interest of inclusiveness.

Scoured wools are made dutiable at 3 cents more per pound of clean content than wools imported in the grease or washed. One cent of this is for the purpose of equalizing differences in sorting costs here and abroad; all wools are sorted prior to scouring. The other 2 cents is meant to equalize the difference between scouring costs in the United States and in competing countries.

Wools imported on the skin are made dutiable at 2 cents less per pound of clean content than wools imported in the grease or washed. This duty is to be applied to all the wool. The 2-cent differential is necessary to equalize the difference between wool-pulling costs at home and abroad.

Sorted wools or matchings are made dutiable at 1 cent per pound more than wools imported in the grease or washed to equalize the difference between wool sorting costs in the United States and in competing countries. The words "if not scoured" are added to prevent possible attempts to import scoured wools as sorted wools, since virtually all wools are sorted prior to scouring.

In the bonding provision phraseology is added to limit liquidation of the bond when the wools are spun into carpet yarns to those yarns which are suitable only for use in floor coverings. This is done to protect the Government against possible misuse of the finer carpet yarns.

The provision for free entry, under bond, of carpet wools for use in knit or felt boots, or heavy fulled lumbermen's socks, is eliminated.

The definition of scoured wools has been clarified in order to prevent misunderstanding.

"Skirtings," i. e., the less desirable portions of the fleece, are excluded from consideration as sorted wools or matchings. It would be illogical to impose a higher duty on these "off sorts," which are removed in the ordinary preparation of fleeces for market, than is imposed on the fleece itself.

PARAGRAPH 1102

The first subparagraph of this paragraph is eliminated. The woolgrowers agreed to a lower duty on 40/44's provided they secured a duty of 34 cents per pound of clean content on the finer wools. Failing in this it seems illogical to retain the provision for a lower duty on 40/44's.

The duty in subparagraph (b) is placed at 31 cents per pound of clean content, i. e., at the rate in the present law. This is done in view of the increase of about 33 per cent in the domestic clip during the past six years. No higher duty would seem to be necessary for the adequate protection of the American woolgrower against foreign competition. The same differentials on wools imported on the skin, on sorted wools, and on scoured wools, are provided as in paragraph 1101. The tolerance provision is eliminated as unnecessary.

PARAGRAPH 1103

The tolerance provisions placed in paragraphs 1101 and 1102 of the House bill having been eliminated, paragraph 1103 is restored to its form under the 1922 act.

PARAGRAPH 1105.—WOOL WASTES AND BY-PRODUCTS

The rates of duty levied on wool by-products in the act of 1922 were based on the relative values of such materials and clean wool. For example: Noils are normally sold at approximately 80 per cent of the value of a corresponding grade of wool; therefore the rate on carbonized noils was placed at 24 cents per pound, or approximately 80 per cent of the wool duty of 31 cents per pound of clean content. The rates on yarn wastes, shoddy, wool rags, etc., were correspondingly lower.

The House bill retained the system of relative values as a basis on which to fix duties on wool by-products, i. e., they were increased in the ratio that clean wool was increased.

The committee believes that a duty is levied on wool for the purpose of protecting the American woolgrower and that if a substitute for wool is allowed to come in at a lower rate than the duty on wool the intent of Congress is defeated. The duties on wool by-products are therefore levied in accordance with their replacement values and not according to their relative values.

Subparagraph (c), providing for a differential of 7 cents per pound on all wool by-products, is eliminated. A differential of 7 cents per pound is applied to carbonized noils and carbonized wastes n. s. p. f. Wool extract is inserted because of the elimination of subparagraph (c).

In prior tariff acts containing compound rates of duty various value classifications were established for manufactures of wool in which the compensatory duties were lower than the "full" compensatory. This method was based on the theory that fabrics of low value were composed in part of materials that were subject to a lower rate of duty than that imposed on scoured wool, and were, therefore, not entitled to the full compensatory levied on fabrics of higher value composed wholly of virgin wool.

The rates of duty proposed for wool by-products are, in effect, equal to the wool duty. For this reason the lower value classifications, providing for manufactures of wool, which contained compensatory rates less than the full compensatory, are eliminated. This applies to paragraphs 1107, 1108, 1109, 1111, 1112, and 1115.

PARAGRAPH 1106.—PARTIALLY MANUFACTURED WOOL

The committee inserted the phrase "if carbonized" in order to include carbonized wool with partially manufactured wool. The purpose of levying a duty on carbonized wool is to protect the domestic wool-carbonising industry. The House bill provided for carbonized wool in paragraph 1105 (c), which has been eliminated.

PARAGRAPH 1107.—YARNS OF WOOL OR HAIR

The committee eliminated the two lower value brackets, providing for yarns valued at not more than 50 cents per pound, and valued at more than 50 cents but not more than $1 per pound. The compensatory duties in the three remaining brackets are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. The protective rates of 40 and 45 per cent are increased to 45 and 55 per cent, respectively, because labor is a greater part of the total cost than obtains in yarns of lower value.

PARAGRAPH 1108.—DRESS GOODS AND OTHER LIGHT-WEIGHT FABRICS OF WOOL

The committee eliminated the two lower value brackets providing for fabrics valued at not more than 80 cents per pound, and valued at more than 80 cents but not more than $1.25 per pound. The compensatory duties are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates on all-wool cloths.

An additional bracket is provided for cotton-warp fabrics valued at more than $1.50 per pound. The domestic manufacturers of high-grade cotton-warp linings purchase their cotton warps abroad. The protective rate is increased from 55 to 60 per cent because labor is a greater part of the total cost than obtains in fabrics of lower value.

PARAGRAPH 1109.—CLOTHS AND OTHER HEAVY-WEIGHT FABRICS OF WOOL

The committee eliminated the three lower value brackets, providing for cloths valued at not more than 60 cents per pound, valued at more than 60 cents but not more than 80 cents per pound, and valued at more than 80 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound; $1.25 is substituted for $1.50 per pound to conform with the lower bracket of paragraph 1108. The compensatory duties are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

Subparagraph (b) of the House bill covered articles made out of woven felts, but did not include articles which became articles on the loom in the process of weaving. This latter class of articles is also included by the committee amendment, whether they are units or are in the piece ready for separation into units.

PARAGRAPH 1110.—PILE FABRICS OF WOOL OR HAIR AND MANUFACTURES THEREOF

The committee reduced the compensatory duties proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

PARAGRAPH 1111.—WOOL BLANKETS AND SIMILAR ARTICLES

The committee eliminated the two lower value brackets, providing for blankets and similar articles valued at not more than 50 cents per pound and valued at more than 50 cents but not more than $1 per pound. The compensatory duties are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

PARAGRAPH 1112.—FELTS, NOT WOVEN, WHOLLY OR IN CHIEF VALUE OF WOOL

The committee eliminated the two lower value brackets, providing for felts valued at not more than 50 cents per pound, and valued at more than 50 cents but not more than $1.50 per pound. The compensatory duties are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

PARAGRAPH 1113.—WOOL SMALL WARES

The compensatory duty is reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rate.

PARAGRAPH 1114.—WOOL KNIT GOODS

The compensatory rates are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the duty on wool. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

The phrase "finished or unfinished" is inserted in subparagraph (b) in conformity with the phraseology in subparagraphs (c) and (d). A new provision is added to exclude hosiery in part of rayon or other synthetic textile. (See par. 1309.)

PARAGRAPH 1115.—WOOL WEARING APPAREL, NOT KNIT OR CROCHETED

In subparagraph (a) the committee eliminated the two lower value brackets, providing for clothing valued at not more than $2 per pound, and at more than $2 but not more than $4 per pound. The compensatory duties in the two remaining brackets are reduced proportionate to the decrease in the wool duty. No change is made in the ad valorem rates.

In subparagraph (b) the rates of duty on wool-felt hat bodies is reduced from 40 cents per pound and 75 per cent ad valorem to 30 cents per pound and 50 per cent ad valorem. There is retained the additional duty of 25 cents per hat body if stamped, blocked, or trimmed. The word "pulled" is eliminated for administrative reasons. The phrase "wholly or in part" is changed to "wholly or in chief value" to correspond to the provisions in other paragraphs of the schedule.

In arriving at the above rates of duty the committee took into consideration the following factors: (1) The effect of the House rate on the price to the consumer, (2) adequate protection to the domestic manufacturer, and (3) protection to American labor.

(1) The rate of 40 cents per pound and 75 per cent ad valorem, stated in the House bill, would tend to increase the retail price of wool-felt hats to a considerable extent over the prices prevailing under the rates now in effect. These hats are worn by the ordinary consumer, therefore the committee proposes a reduction from an equivalent ad valorem rate of approximately 102 per cent, proposed in the House bill, to an equivalent ad valorem rate of approximately 70 per cent.

(2) The hearings before the subcommittee on Schedule 11 indicated that, with efficient management and modern machinery, the domestic manufacturer could operate at a profit under the rates proposed in the Senate bill.

(3) The domestic wool-felt hat manufacturers employ approximately 2,200 persons, whereas the domestic hat finishers employ from 25,000 to 75,000 persons. The latter finish both domestic and foreign hat bodies. Therefore the committee proposes to retain the rate of 25 cents additional on finished hats. The specific duty of 40 cents is reduced to 30 cents per pound for the reason that these hat bodies are made mainly from noils and are, therefore, not entitled to the compensatory duty allowed on articles made from virgin wool.

PARAGRAPH 1116.—ORIENTAL AND SIMILAR CARPETS AND RUGS AND CHENILLE AXMINSTERS

(a) The specific duty of 50 cents per square foot is retained on oriental and other handmade carpets, rugs, and mats to protect the domestic manufacturer in the competitive field. The minimum ad valorem rate is reduced from 60 to 45 per cent for the reason that the manufacturers, importers, and retailers agreed that the minimum ad valorem rate upon the more expensive products was largely for the purpose of revenue only. The reduction of 10 per cent from the 1922 rate will tend to increase importations of high-grade, noncompetitive rugs and will increase rather than decrease the net revenue derived therefrom.

(b) Machinemade oriental weave and chenille Axminster carpets, rugs, and mats were placed in a separate subparagraph because they are directly competitive with domestic products. The specific duty in the House bill of 50 cents per square foot would be prohibitive on the cheaper grades, therefore this duty is eliminated and a straight ad valorem rate of 60 per cent is levied on all grades. Imports of chenille Axminster carpets and rugs amounted, in quantity, to 55 per cent of the entire domestic production of such rugs, woven whole, in 1927. The ad valorem rate of 60 per cent was requested by the manufacturers, importers, and retailers.

SCHEDULE 12.—SILK MANUFACTURES

PARAGRAPH 1205

The duty on broad silks, other than Jacquard woven, is increased from 55 to 60 per cent to afford the domestic-silk industry, which has been in a depressed state in recent years, additional protection on a number of types of fabrics on which there is competition from abroad. Fabrics with multi-colored filling which require slower processes of production than ordinary plain-woven fabrics were pointed out by silk manufacturers as being in particular need of additional protection. Rayon-mixed fabrics, it has been shown, also require additional duty to compensate manufacturers for the rayon yarns used therein. European producers have a competitive raw-material advantage over the American broad-silk weavers on rayon and other synthetic yarns which are higher in price in the United States by the amount of the present rayon duty. The decline in domestic production of "gloria" cloth, coupled with increasing imports from low-wage countries, such as Italy, are the factors which impelled the domestic umbrella fabric industry to seek tariff relief. Although these are the primary classes of goods considered by the committee in raising the duty, the increase will also be effective on other plain silk fabrics, the bulk of which are habutais and pongees in the gray and degummed state imported from the Far East. As such goods are low priced, requests have been made to the committee for a specific rather than ad valorem basis of assessment on these imports. Recognizing the need of an equivalent specific rate higher than the one operative on imports from China and Japan in 1928, the committee is of the opinion that in lieu of a specific scale of duty the increase in the present ad valorem rate will be effective in affording the silk industry needed and desired protection on these types of oriental silks.

PARAGRAPH 1208

The only change was the addition of a clause excepting hosiery in part of rayon or other synthetic textile from paragraph 1208 in order to avoid conflict with paragraph 1309 as amended.

SCHEDULE 13.—MANUFACTURES OF RAYON OR OTHER SYNTHETIC TEXTILE

PARAGRAPH 1301

As written, the House bill provides in paragraph 1301 for rayon yarns, which term in trade usage means ordinarily filaments which in the process of manufacture are twisted together and are adaptable for use in textile operations without further conversion. Thus interpreted, the word "yarn" does not include artificial horsehair—a monofilament—nor the long-length filaments which, after extrusion from the spinning nozzle, are wound by parallel grouping without twisting. Since such filaments may be twisted into a yarn by silk throwsters and manufacturing consumers, they would be competitive after conversion from the imported state. There is, therefore, added to paragraph 1301 a new provision for rayon filaments, single or grouped, to cover both the artificial horsehair and the long untwisted filaments.

To aid the silk throwsters who are depending on the newly developed demand for rayon, crêpe yarns as a business stimulant to energize the depressed throwing industry, there is appended to paragraph 1301 a new provision for a cumulative specific duty of 50 cents per pound on yarns having more than 20 turns twist per inch. At the present House rate, the increment of duty obtained on the ad valorem basis by reason of the increased value of the high-twist yarns as compared with regular yarns is not sufficient to take care of the difference between domestic and foreign throwing costs. Moreover, in the event of a price decline bringing the minimum specific proviso into operation, rayon crêpe yarn would be on a duty parity with rayon yarn of ordinary twist, an inequitable adjustment in view of the extra labor involved in its manufacture. The differential is added, therefore, to give these high-twist yarns the necessary protection.

The filaments provided for under this paragraph of the House bill are not confined to the short-length untwisted filaments, other than waste, suitable for use as material in the manufacture of spun rayon yarn on the cotton, silk, or worsted spinning system. In order to exclude the untwisted filaments of indefinite length which are adaptable for throwing, there is added after the words "filaments of rayon or other synthetic textile," the words "not exceeding 30 inches in length."

The manufacture of these short, untwisted filaments known as staple fiber, is virtually a new branch of the rayon industry, domestic production having been conducted up to the present time by but one company which manufactures it on a small scale as an adjunct to denier rayon yarns. Other companies are now about to initiate its manufacture. The duty on staple fiber is therefore increased to foster the expansion of this new development. Increased domestic production of staple fiber will afford the manufacturers of spun rayon yarn an auxiliary raw material to supplement the limited supply of rayon waste which is threatening to become inadequate both here and abroad for the growing needs of the industry.

PARAGRAPH 1303

The upward adjustment of the compensatory duty on spun rayon yarns from 10 cents per pound to 20 cents per pound is made in the first place because of the increase in the duty on staple fiber, one of the raw materials employed in its manufacture. Cognizance is also taken of the need of additional protection by the spun rayon yarn industry which has had its activity slackened by the competition of increasing imports of finer-count yarns.

The bulk of the domestic business is done on these fine yarns, in the production of which labor costs constitute a large element of the manufacturing expense. As European manufacturers have been able to undersell the domestic fine-sized yarns in the American market, additional protection is granted to cover the difference between foreign and domestic manufacturing costs due to the additional labor involved on fine counts.

PARAGRAPH 1309

No change in rate. The words "wholly or in part" have been substituted for "wholly or in chief value" when applying to hosiery. This is done because domestic manufacturers complain of increasing imports of men's half-hose in chief value of cotton (dutiable 50 per cent) but having the body of rayon or other synthetic textile which are sold at retail as rayon hosiery.

PARAGRAPH 1311

The duty on wearing apparel is reduced to make the rate consistent with that imposed on knit wearing apparel in paragraph 1309, the difference in rates in the two paragraphs not appearing justifiable.

PARAGRAPH 1312

The duty in the basket paragraph of the rayon schedule is reduced to the level of the rate in paragraph 1311, covering rayon wearing apparel, in order to establish a relation of equality of duty between these two paragraphs in accordance with the procedure adopted for the corresponding paragraphs in the silk schedule.

PARAGRAPH 1313

Rayon, the designation adopted in 1924 by the National Dry Goods Association to supersede the term "artificial silk," is employed in the House bill as a generic term applicable to all types of chemical yarns now commercially produced. Sponsored and promoted by the group of manufacturers employing the viscose process, which represents more than 80 per cent of the industry, the term "rayon" has not been adopted by the group of three companies using the nitrocellulose, cuprammonium, and cellulose acetate processes as a descriptive name for their products. Objection has been made particularly to the use of the coined word "rayon" as a term inclusive of yarns made by the cellulose acetate method. These yarns have chemical and physical properties sufficiently dissimilar to require dyes and dry-cleaning reagents wholly different from those employed in the treatment of yarns made by the other three processes. Recognizing the possibility of confusion and loss to the consumer by merging the identity of such yarns with other types of chemical yarns under "rayon" is a common generic name, the committee has adopted the principle of the Goldsborough amendment. Accordingly, the word "rayon," wherever used in the House bill as a substantive, is supplemented by adding the words "or other synthetic textile." When employed as an adjective, before such nouns as "manufactures," "yarns," "waste," "filaments," "sewing thread," etc., the change is made by adding after these words the modifying prepositional phrase "of rayon or other synthetic textile."

SCHEDULE 14.—PAPERS AND BOOKS

The principal changes made by the Finance Committee in Schedule 14 (papers and books) of the House bill are in the nature of clarifying clauses, amendments aimed toward clearer classifications to lessen litigation, and a harmonizing of terms, weights, and thicknesses. Approximately seven increases in rates are shown and about the same number of decreases in rates are indicated.

No changes of any description were made in paragraphs 1401, 1407, 1411, and 1412 of the House bill.

PARAGRAPH 1402

In paragraph 1402, which provides for nonprocessed paper board, wall board, and pulpboard, including cardboard, and leatherboard or compress leather, the committee rephrased the processing terms employed with a view of eliminating ambiguities. No change in rates is made in this paragraph.

The terms "plate finished, supercalendered or friction calendered" are substituted for "glazed." The term "glazed" in this paragraph is used in a descriptive rather than a commercial sense. Administrative officials have been unable to determine the exact degree of gloss which is intended by the term "glazed." The terms "plate finished, supercalendered or friction calendered" are here used to indicate a gloss produced by a secondary process. These processes, generally speaking, are obtained by passing paper or board over one or a series of rolls sometimes of different materials, with or without heat, under pressure.

Laminated board as known in the industry consists of two or more layers of board combined with an adhesive substance. Board composed of layers which have been united or combined by pressure on a multicylinder machine in one process without the use of an adhesive substance is known in the trade as unlaminated board. The term "laminated by means of an adhesive substance" which is substituted for "laminated or pasted" in the House bill is here used to indicate a board produced as a secondary process by combining two or more layers with the employment of an adhesive substance.

Coated board is now held for tariff purposes to be a board the surface of which is coated with a layer of some substance. Board to the surface of which stain or dye has been applied in the same manner as a coating, is now classified for duty as an uncoated board because the stain or dye is absorbed and there is no apparent coating on the surface of the board. The term "surface stained or dyed" is here used to indicate a board to which stain or dye has been applied to the surface.

Lined board under the present law is held to be board to the surface of which a liner (outside or exposed layers) has been pasted after the board was manufactured. Vat-lined board is board to which a liner is applied in the form of a layer of pulp at the time of manufacture in one process and is classified for duty as an unlined board. Vat-lined board competes in the trade with lined board, and the term "lined or vat-lined" is here used to indicate a board which has been lined by means of pasting or which has been produced in the form of a layer of pulp at the time of manufacture in one process.

The same terms used in paragraph 1402 to describe processed boards are repeated in paragraph 1413.

PARAGRAPH 1403

The rate on manufactures of pulp in paragraph 1403 is increased from 25 per cent to 30 per cent to correspond to the rate on paper not specially provided for in paragraph 1409. Paper is a manufacture of pulp, and in a case where an article manufactured of pulp and similar to paper, though not known as paper, is imported, the same rate of duty will apply whether the article be classified as pulp or of paper.

PARAGRAPH 1404

The chief change made in paragraph 1404 is the inclusion in the bracket covering crêpe paper of a provision for paper wadding, pulp wadding, and manufactures of such wadding. The wadding referred to consists of a number of thin, soft, highly absorbent layers, and is used for candy-box padding, surgical, and sanitary purposes, and similar uses. Much customs litigation in the matter of classification has occurred, and by the specific mention of wadding the intent of the Congress is made clear.

The term "white or printed" as applied to light-weight paper is restored. The inclusion of this term is to insure tissue papers when printed taking the duty provided for light-weight papers rather than a lower duty in some other paragraph.

PARAGRAPH 1405

The committee restored the language and rates of the act of 1922 in paragraph 1405 on photographic paper for sensitizing and sensitized photographic paper. The House bill provided separate brackets for basic blue-print and brown-print paper and sensitized blue-print and brown-print paper, and materially reduced the rate on basic photographic paper.

PARAGRAPH 1406

The principal change in paragraph 1406 is the reduction in the rates of duty provided in the House bill on ceramic decalcomanias. The rate on ceramic decalcomanias weighing not over 100 pounds per 1,000 sheets is reduced from $1.40 per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem to $1.25 per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem; on ceramic decalcomanias weighing over 100 pounds per 1,000 sheets the rate is reduced from 35 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem to 30 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem. The rates in the two brackets are compensatory. The committee took this action so that no undue burden should be placed on the pottery industry which utilizes the decalcomanias in the decoration of chinaware. Other changes made in paragraph 1406 are in the rates covering die cutting and embossing, and in the increased thickness of paper due to the use of bulkier types in the lithographic industry.

PARAGRAPH 1408

To the provision for envelopes is added "envelopes, filled or unfilled, whether the contents are dutiable or free" and the proviso, "That paper envelopes which contain merchandise subject to an ad valorem rate of duty or a duty based in whole or in part upon the value thereof shall be dutiable at the rate applicable to their contents, but not less than the rates provided for herein." The intent of the added phraseology is to make dutiable envelopes for mailing lithographic greeting cards and other similar commodities. Under the present law the packing for lithographed goods is not dutiable.

PARAGRAPH 1409

The committee reverts to the language and rates of the act of 1922 on both plain and printed hanging paper in paragraph 1409. The rates prevailing in the act of 1922 on filtering paper are restored, and the rate on cover paper specifically provided for in the House bill is reduced.

PARAGRAPH 1410

The rate of duty on maps and charts in paragraph 1410 is increased over the rate provided in the House bill. The only other change made in this paragraph is a clarifying clause added to the brackets covering greeting cards, valentines, and all other social or gift cards.

PARAGRAPH 1413

The committee in paragraph 1413 employs the same language to describe processes of paper board, pulpboard, cardboard, and leatherboard as are used in paragraph 1302. The committee also makes a specific provision for ribbon flycatchers.

SCHEDULE 15.—SUNDRIES

GENERAL

Some of the important items now in the sundries schedule are hides, leather, boots and shoes, manufactures of leather, laces and embroideries, toys, jewelry, manufactures of rubber, furs and fur goods, cork products, fur felt and straw hats, sporting and athletic goods, and musical instruments.

Schedule 15 is an important one from a revenue-producing standpoint. In 1927 the merchandise entered for consumption under the sundries schedule was valued at $226,117,000, upon which the duties amounted to $88,624,000, being exceeded in value only by Schedule 7 (agricultural products and provisions), and in duties only by Schedule 5 (sugar, molasses, and manufactures thereof). The transfer in the House bill of hides, leather, boots and shoes from the free list will tend to increase the importance of this schedule as a revenue producer, notwithstanding that diamonds and other precious stones, rough and uncut, have been transferred to the free list and that the rate of duty on such stones, cut but not set, and on pearls has been reduced from 20 to 10 per cent.

CHANGES IN RATES OF DUTY AND TRANSFERS

The committee has made approximately 71 changes in the rates in the House bill. Of this number, 49 are decreases and 22 increases. Diamonds and other precious stones, rough or uncut, have been transferred to the free list. Cotton wiping rags provided for in paragraph 1555 of the House bill have been transferred to the cotton schedule, paragraph 922. A paragraph (new, 1557) relating to stamping and embossing materials of pigments has been added. These articles appear to be more appropriately provided for here rather than in paragraph 382 (b) of Schedule 3, metals and manufactures of.

PARAGRAPH 1501 (B).—ASBESTOS PRODUCTS

The words "synthetic resin" are inserted for the purpose of excluding articles containing synthetic resin which might be manufactured with a small asbestos content to take advantage of the rates of duty in this paragraph.

PARAGRAPH 1502.—ATHLETIC GOODS

Subparagraph (b) emphasizes the intent to exclude from the paragraph all articles designed chiefly for the amusement of children, although some of such articles may afford incidental physical exercise or may be educational. Golf tees are specifically provided for to insure their inclusion under this paragraph.

PARAGRAPH 1503.—IMITATION SOLID PEARL BEADS

Domestic production of imitation solid pearl beads has decreased from $5,000,000 in 1924 to $1,500,000 in 1928. Since 1924 Japan has been the chief source of imports of imitation solid pearl beads, some of which are valued as low as one-eighth cent per inch. Japanese beads, which at first were of such inferior quality as not to be comparable with domestic imitation pearl beads, have in the last few years improved to such a degree that domestic manufacturers report severe competition in the better grades.

According to a preliminary statement of information issued by the United States Tariff Commission in connection with a cost-of-production investigation, the lowest selling price in 1926 of domestic-made beads ranged from 3.34 to 5 cents per inch, with an average cost of production, not including selling expenses, of 2.79 cents per inch. The average import value per inch falling within the same price range was 1.01 cents for Japan and 1.06 cents for France.

PARAGRAPH 1505.—STRAW BRAIDS AND HATS

Braids: Subparagraph (a), dealing with braids, etc., composed wholly or in chief value of straw, chip, etc., has been changed by the committee, which added the following language: "Any of the foregoing containing any part, however small, of rayon or other synthetic textile, 90 per cent ad valorem."

Under the act of 1922 pedaline braids entered under the provisions of paragraph 1430 at 90 per cent ad valorem, but under a recent interpretation such braids were classified under paragraph 1406 of the act of 1922 if in chief value of manila hemp at either 15 or 20 per cent ad valorem.

For the purpose of clarifying the matter the committee added the above language so that braids made of strands or filaments wrapped or treated with rayon or synthetic textile similating or substituting for pure rayon or synthetic textile braids will be dutiable at 90 per cent ad valorem, the same rate provided for rayon or synthetic textile braids in paragraph 1529 (a), report of the Senate Finance Committee.

This action was deemed justifiable by the facts developed in the hearing.

Straw hats: The number of wage earners employed in the men's straw-hat industry has declined since 1914. American manufacturers in 1914 furnished 94 per cent of the consumption of straw hats in the United States and in 1928 approximately 50 per cent. Wages in Italy, the chief competing country, average $6.72 for a 48-hour week as against a wage of $1 an hour for straw-hat makers in the United States. The report of the Tariff Commission (July 17, 1925) to the President showed that the total manufacturing cost per dozen in Italy was $5.98, compared with $12.74 for domestic. The cost, including transportation to New York, for Italian hats was $7.08 per dozen, and an ad valorem duty necessary to equalize on the basis of foreign valuation was 88 per cent ad valorem.

Since the President's proclamation (effective March 14, 1926), which placed a duty of 88 per cent ad valorem on men's sewed straw hats valued at $9.50 or less per dozen, imports entered under this classification have decreased in number, value, and unit value. Imports of other sewed hats entered under the 60 per cent ad valorem rate have increased very rapidly. Other sewed hats included not only men's sewed straw hats valued at more than $9.50 per dozen but also sewed hats made of material other than straw regardless of the value of the hat. Thus men's sewed hats made of chip braid, similar in appearance to and competing with men's sewed straw hats, valued at $9.50 or less per dozen, are dutiable at 60 per cent and not at the proclaimed rate of 88 per cent. In 1927 imports of sewed hats dutiable at 60 per cent numbered 750,240 hats; in 1928, 1,808,214 hats; in 1929 (January–June, inclusive), 2,873,084 hats. At the same time the unit value per hat decreased from 68 cents in 1927 to 33 cents in 1929.

Subparagraph (c) has been added by the committee in order to protect the domestic manufacturers in case of importations of hats, bonnets, hoods, composed wholly or in chief value of any braid not provided for in this paragraph, if such braid is composed in any part, however small, of rayon or other synthetic textile.

PARAGRAPH 1506.—BROOMS AND BRUSHES

Domestic production of brooms decreased from $26,261,824 in 1923 to $18,444,912 in 1927. Imports decreased from $51,693 in 1923 to $10,751 in 1927. Evidence was submitted that increased imports of brooms are to be anticipated by reason of recent exports of domestic broom machinery to certain European countries in which supplies of broomcorn are available.

The ratio of the total number of imported toothbrushes having handles composed of products provided for in paragraph 31 to the total number produced annually in the domestic industry is 50 per cent or more, the principal competition being in those retailing at from 10 to 25 cents each. Japan is the principal source of these imports. Domestic toothbrush production, which is carried on mostly in establishments not controlled by pyroxylin manufacturers, has been materially curtailed by reason of the quantity of toothbrushes imported. Competition from imported toilet brushes having pyroxylin handles or backs is less keen than for toothbrushes. Information has been submitted to show that pyroxylin brush handles and backs are apparently being imported in considerable quantities at low prices. With respect to toilet brushes mounted in gold, etc., testimony has been given that these articles are not products of the brush industry; that they are usually sold as component parts of sets; and that such articles require a duty of 60 per cent advaloren. Imports of hair pencils increased from 3,045,249 in 1923 to 17,820,720 in 1927, but these articles are not manufactured in the United States.

PARAGRAPH 1511.—MANUFACTURES OF CORK

The domestic cork industry in 1927 consisted of 26 establishments, which employed about 4,000 workers, and had a product valued at over $17,000,000. The chief cork products manufactured in this country are bottle corks, wafers and washers, tile, and cork insulation. Production has increased little in recent census periods and has apparently been influenced by large increases in the imports of cork stoppers, wafers, and washers, tile, and insulation. Sales of domestic stoppers were nearly $600,000 and insulation about $630,000 less in 1927 than in 1926.

Imports consist chiefly of insulation, stoppers, tile, wafers, and washers. Insulation as now made is purely an American development, but since the war Spain and Portugal have increased their production of this article many times and have been sending insulation to this country in largely increased amounts in recent years. Imports, which were less than 9,000,000 pounds in 1921, increased steadily and in 1927 were over 50,000,000 pounds. In 1927 and 1928 imports of cork insulation formed approximately 50 per cent of domestic consumption. Because of this competition two domestic firms have purchased factories abroad, are importing large and increasing amounts of insulation from their foreign factories, and have decreased their domestic production. In addition to the two American firms who manufacture insulation abroad, one other American firm is importing increased amounts of insulation and curtailing domestic production.

The remarks made in regard to cork insulation are, in general, true of cork tile. It is an American development. Imports averaged about 560,000 square feet in the three years 1926–1928, with a value of just over 10 cents per square foot. This was about 40 per cent of the total domestic consumption.

There were no imports of cork stoppers made of artificial or compressed cork in 1928, and only minor quantities in prior years. Practically all imported stoppers are of natural cork bark. Imports have increased 169 per cent in quantity, 476 per cent in total value, and 114 per cent in average value per pound since 1922. The value of imports in 1928 was nearly 30 per cent greater than in any prior year and the increased unit value per pound has resulted in a lower equivalent ad valorem duty than in 1922.

Shell corks are perforated stoppers and are used in toilet and condiment bottles and other similar containers. They are made of very high-grade cork, there is much breakage and waste, and the cost of production and unit value are proportionally high. The domestic price of these corks was stated in testimony to be $2.65 per pound, and that of the imported $1.30 per pound, exclusive of duty, a difference of $1.35 per pound. The rate of duty has been made 75 cents per pound.

The comments on shell corks, except as to use, apply to cork penholder grips, although the latter have a considerably higher cost of production. The domestic price was testified to be $7.20 per pound, while the prevailing import price, exclusive of duty, was $4.30 per pound. The rate of duty has been made $1.50 per pound.

Imports of disks, wafers, and washers are unimportant with the exception of those three-sixteenths of an inch or less in thickness, made of natural cork bark, which averaged over $600,000 per year for the last four years, 1925–1928.

PARAGRAPH 1513.—TOYS

Domestic production in establishments primarily engaged in the manufacture of toys, including playground equipment, increased from $35,491,345 in 1923 to $66,844,886 in 1927. The total number of employees and the total wages paid also increased in this period. The total value of toys imported under this paragraph decreased from $8,082,322 in 1923 to $4,611,393 in 1927. Evidence submitted showed that keen competition exists due to the large quantity of toys imported, particularly from Germany, described and classified otherwise than as toys, under other paragraphs, wherein these articles are dutiable at lower rates than the 70 per cent here provided.

The manufacture of pyroxylin dolls and toys, composed of products provided for in paragraph 31, is carried on in establishments other than those included in census figures as toy manufacturers.

An unusually large amount of customs litigation caused by the classification of articles ordinarily known as toys has occurred. In the act of 1922, such articles have been classified under paragraph 228 (optical instruments), paragraphs 211 and 212 (toys of earthenware, china, etc.), paragraph 385 (tinsel toys), paragraph 1402 (sporting goods), paragraph 1443 (musical instruments), and toy favors, souvenirs, containers, etc., generally heretofore have been assessed for duty at less than 70 per cent. These articles are made dutiable under this paragraph.

By striking out House bill phraseology, dolls and doll clothing, composed in part of laces, embroideries, etc., are excluded from this paragraph, the effect being to make these articles dutiable under paragraph 1529 (a) without special mention. Other doll clothing is specifically excluded from the paragraph, and will become dutiable according to the nature of the article. By eliminating House bill phraseology, dolls, toys, and parts thereof, composed of products provided for in paragraph 31 are made dutiable at the 70 per cent rate. Toy favors, etc., not specially provided for in the act of 1922 or in the House bill, are here specially provided for. The term "toy" is defined with the intention of insuring classification under this paragraph of all articles chiefly used for the amusement of children. It is intended by the phraseology included in the proviso, adopted in the House bill and approved by the committee, and by including the definition of "toy," by striking out special mention of toys in paragraphs 211, 212, and 385, and by including new phraseology in paragraphs 228, 1502, and 1541 (d), to make all toys dutiable at 70 per cent under this paragraph, excepting that wherever toys are dutiable elsewhere under other descriptions at more than 70 per cent, such other rate shall apply.

PARAGRAPH 1514.—ABRASIVES

Grain or ground garnet, covered by the provisions of paragraph 214 as a mineral substance, was nevertheless held by Treasury decision exempt from duty as ground ore under paragraph 1619 of the 1922 act. It has been included by the committee with other abrasives at the same rate carried by them.

A clause is added to the paragraph to cover certain alloy content of abrasives. It is intended to apply to metallic carbides and other hard materials used as artificial abrasives.

The rates are approximately the same as rates on similar products in other paragraphs.

PARAGRAPH 1516.—MATCHES

The total value of the domestic production of matches of all kinds increased from $23,940,064 in 1923 to $24,725,404 in 1927. The total number of establishments, wage earners, and wages paid decreased in that period. Practically all of the imports consist of single-tipped, strike-on-the-box matches. Nearly all of these come from Sweden or from some of the foreign countries in which production is controlled by a large Swedish producer. Domestic competition from imports is increasing. Imports increased from 3,534,856 gross boxes in 1923 to 5,519,616 gross boxes in 1928, the unit foreign value showing a decrease in that period from 46 to 37 cents per gross. Very few matches similar to those imported are made at present in the domestic industry, although such matches could be made with minor adjustments in present equipment. Information obtained from the United States Department of Agriculture bulletins and from trade sources leads to the belief that abundant supplies of wood suitable for the production of the strike-on-the-box matches and match splints and skillets is available in the United States.

The rate of duty on imports of matches in boxes containing more than 100 matches each has been adjusted so as to make the rate per 1,000 matches equal to the rate per gross boxes.

PARAGRAPH 1519.—FURS

Dressed dog, goat, or kid skins, and plates, mats, etc., thereof, are made dutiable at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem. The words "linings, strips," have been added in order that importations under the classification will receive the same rate as plates, mats, etc.

Mats and strips have been added in order to make rates uniform with manufactures of fur further advanced than dressing, prepared for use as material.

PARAGRAPH 1527.—JEWELRY

Foreign competition on novelty jewelry made of metal other than gold or platinum has increased greatly in recent years, especially from Czechoslovakia, France, and Germany. Imports have doubled in value and increased almost tenfold in quantity since 1923.

Domestic production of jewelry in 1927 was $164,000,000, a decrease of $10,000,000 since 1923. It is estimated that $45,000,000 of the $164,000,000 in 1927 was novelty jewelry, with decreased production in 1928.

After adding duty and other charges to foreign invoice value of imports of novelty jewelry, it is estimated that at least $10,000,000, or about 25 per cent, of domestic production of novelty jewelry on a value basis—and even a greater percentage on a quantity basis—has been replaced by imports.

The committee amendment inserting the words "or of which the metal part is wholly or in chief value of gold or platinum" is for the purpose of making a piece of jewelry, etc., when of gold or platinum, but in chief value of a precious stone, dutiable at 80 per cent instead of at the higher rate provided in the House bill.

PARAGRAPH 1528.—DIAMONDS

Imports of diamonds in 1913 were $37,458,995, and in 1927, $52,206,377. There is no record of the number of carats imported in 1913, but as the cost of diamonds per carat in 1927 was two and one-third times that of 1913 and the number of carats imported in 1927 was 682,666, it follows that approximately 1,140,000 carats were imported in 1913. This is a decline of 450,000 carats. It is known that the world production of diamonds in 1927 was much greater than in 1913, and that the United States to-day is buying a much larger proportion of the world production than in 1913. It is claimed, therefore, that the amount of diamonds coming into the United States is almost as great as the amount of diamonds passing through customs.

The committee transferred diamonds and other precious stones, rough or uncut, to paragraph 1668 of the free list; and reduced the rate on diamonds and other precious stones, cut but not set, and on pearls or parts of pearls, in an effort to reduce the incentive to smuggle.

The committee inserted "and iridescent imitation solid pearls" to make the phraseology of this paragraph correspond with the phraseology in paragraph 1503.

The committee struck out "not coated with fish-scale solution," as otherwise there would be no provision in this paragraph for imitation half pearls "coated with fish-scale solution."

PARAGRAPH 1529 (B).—HANDKERCHIEFS

The compound rate of 4 cents each and 40 per cent ad valorem on embroidered or lace-trimmed handkerchiefs was changed because the equivalent ad valorem rates based on these figures were considered abnormally high on low-grade goods.

In the revised rates of 3 cents each and 40 per cent ad valorem the value limit of 60 cents per dozen was set so that low-grade goods imported from countries having unusually low production costs can not come in below an equivalent ad valorem rate considered sufficient to protect the domestic manufacturer.

The minimum rate of 75 per cent ad valorem was set so that under the compound rate the higher grade goods could not come in at an equivalent ad valorem rate lower than that of the present law.

The additional rate of 1 cent each on handkerchiefs having hand-made hems or hand-rolled hems was imposed in order to encourage the hand workers in Porto Rico who tend to specialize in those types of hems.

PARAGRAPH 1529 (C).—ELASTIC FABRICS

It was brought to the attention of the committee that the House provisions imposing a duty of 60 per cent ad valorem on elastic fabrics in part of india rubber, more than 12 inches in width, could be evaded by bringing in fabrics of less than 12 inches in width and sewing them together. The committee amendment, therefore, strikes out the size limitation, so that the 60 per cent rate will apply regardless of width.

PARAGRAPH 1530.—LEATHER AND MANUFACTURES OF LEATHER

Leather: The tanning industry of the United States has been in a depressed condition since the World War. Many plants have been dismantled and many are operating part time only. In 1928 there were 51,940 laborers employed in domestic tanneries, as compared with 59,703 in 1923, a decrease of 13 per cent. Salaried employees have decreased 800 in number during this period. Imports have increased rapidly while exports have declined. Leather is one of the key industries vital to national defense and has not shown profitable conditions in recent years. In order to protect the industry against the increasing foreign competition and to compensate for a duty on raw materials, duties have been placed on the various classes of leather, which will tend to equalize the differences in material and labor costs in the United States and foreign countries.

An entirely new subparagraph (c) has been inserted. This new subparagraph covers in more detail the various classes of leather, contained therein, and places the same duty on leather cut or wholly or partly manufactured into uppers, vamps, or any forms or shapes suitable for conversion into boots, shoes, or footwear as the leather from which they are manufactured.

Boots and shoes: The total domestic production of boots and shoes during the period January–June, 1929, showed an increase of 2.3 per cent, as compared with a similar period in 1928. Imports of leather footwear increased from 871,074 pairs, valued at $1,091,916, in 1922, to 3,249,939 pairs, valued at $9,273,406, in 1928. During the first six months of 1929 there were imported 4,201,441 pairs of leather footwear, valued at $10,024,344, as compared with 1,437,183 and 2,195,125 pairs during the corresponding respective periods of 1927 and 1928. Women's shoes continue to dominate the imports, coming principally from Czechoslovakia. The competition of these imports is most keenly felt by manufacturers of MacKay type of women's shoes, who are located principally in Massachusetts. The importation of the women's turn shoes, produced in Switzerland, is felt by the domestic manufacturers located principally in Brooklyn, N. Y. The average wage in the shoe industry of Czechoslovakia, the principal competing country, is about one-third that prevailing in the shoe industry in this country.

A duty has been placed on boots and shoes, which is compensatory for a duty on hides and leather and also protective in order to bring about nearer equalizations of foreign and domestic labor costs.

PARAGRAPH 1535.—FISHING TACKLE

The committee amendment restores the rates and language of the 1922 act.

PARAGRAPH 1539 (B).—SYNTHETIC RESIN

The committee has retained the provision for laminated products of which any synthetic resin or resinlike substance is the chief binding agent, in sheets or plates and in rods, sheets, and tubes, or other forms, and manufactures wholly or in chief value of any of the foregoing.

This provision covers laminated products made from paper, or paper, cotton, linen, or other material united with a synthetic resin or resinlike substance. One of the two important uses is the manufacture of parts of electrical and mechanical machinery. The high dielectric properties render them of special importance as insulating material for automobile parts, radio sets, and other electrical equipment. They also have mechanical uses, such as for silent gears and other parts of machinery.

The phrase "provided for in paragraph 28," has been deleted in order to include not only synthetic resin or resinlike substances provided for in paragraph 28, but the new synthetic resins provided for in paragraph 11, which have already assumed commercial importance.

The words "strips, blanks," have been inserted in order to include laminated material cut into strips and blanks, and covered by the phrase "or other forms." These strips and blanks belong to the same class as rods, tubes, and blocks.

The phrase "or of any other product of which any synthetic resin or resinlike substance is the chief binding agent," has been inserted in order to make specific provision for an important group of products known as molded products. These are made by molding under heat or heat and pressure a mixture containing synthetic resin or a resinlike substance and a filler, such as wood flour and pigments.

Molded products included in this provision cover a wide range and are used chiefly in electrical or mechanical machinery where requirements of electrical insulation properties, mechanical strength, exactness of form or size, and resistance to destructive agents, render them of peculiar importance. These molded products find a multitude of uses.

PARAGRAPH 1552.—PIPES AND SMOKERS' ARTICLES

Domestic production of pipes and smokers' articles decreased from $9,704,816 in 1923 to $7,273,806 in 1927. Of the 1927 total, $6,946,570 represents pipes, most of which have bowls of brierwood. In the same period the total number of domestic establishments decreased from 30 to 23, the total number of wage earners from 2,402 to 1,807. Total wages paid also show a material decrease. In an investigation of brierwood pipes by the Tariff Commission and in testimony submitted at hearings, information was obtained tending to show that competition from imports of such pipes, particularly those in the lower grades, has seriously affected the domestic pipe industry, and that the rate of duty on such pipes under the act of 1922 has been inadequate.

It is estimated that approximately 75 per cent of the imports of pipes consist of those having brierwood bowls. Evidence was also submitted to show that the imports of cigar and cigarette holders, composed of synthetic phenolic resin have practically eliminated the domestic production of such articles and that a wide variance exists between the foreign and domestic production costs. Testimony was also given as to the possibility of substituting pipes having bowls made of materials other than brierwood and holders composed of materials other than synthetic resin. Such pipes and holders should be made dutiable at the same rate as brierwood pipes and holders of synthetic resin.

PARAGRAPH 1557.—STAMPING AND EMBOSSING MATERIALS

This paragraph provides for articles similar in use to those provided for in paragraph 382 (b), but composed of pigments instead of metal powders. They are now dutiable as surface-coated paper at compound rates.

SCHEDULE 16.—FREE LIST

PARAGRAPH 1601.—NITRIC ACID

The committee amendment restores nitric acid to the free list, where it is found under the 1922 act. The House bill made it dutiable at one-half of 1 cent a pound under paragraph 1.

PARAGRAPH 1604.—CREAM SEPARATORS

The change in valuation results in transferring machines valued at more than $40 but not more than $50 each to paragraph 372 at 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1607.—ANIMALS FOR EXHIBITION

The express provision of the House bill relating to fish was eliminated in this paragraph, because fish brought in for the purpose of breeding or exhibition are already made free of duty under paragraph 1677 as "Fish imported to be used for purposes other than for human consumption."

PARAGRAPH 1612.—ARROWROOT

The committee amendment puts on the free list arrowroot, manufactured, and starch and flour, which are at present dutiable under paragraph 85 of the 1922 act as starch. This change has been made in order to permit the free entry of arrowroot starch, which is very easily digested and used largely in the preparation of baby foods.

PARAGRAPH 1615.—AMERICAN GOODS RETURNED

The 1922 act and the House bill permit the free entry of articles of domestic growth or manufacture when returned without advance in value or condition, but only if imported by the exporter. The committee amendment removes this limitation as to the importer.

The 1922 act and the House bill admit free of duty containers or coverings of American manufacture (except fruit boxes provided for in paragraph 407) which have been exported with benefit of drawback, but only upon the payment of the amount of the drawback. The committee amendment relieves from the repayment of the drawback such containers or coverings as contain merchandise free of duty or subject to a specific duty.

Under existing law films of American manufacture exposed abroad are entitled to free entry, except moving-picture films. The House bill confines the exception to such moving-picture films as are to be used for commercial purposes, thus permitting the free entry of moving-picture films imported neither for exhibtion for profit nor for sale. The committee approves this provision of the House bill.

PARAGRAPH 1623.—BREAD

The definition of bread has been revised so that the intention of the committee might be carried out that only ordinary light-raised bread such as is commonly used in the United States should be free of duty and not the various forms of so-called Swedish rye breads which resemble hard crackers in appearance and taste. These rye breads will automatically be provided for in paragraph 733, where they become dutiable as biscuits or crackers at 30 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1640.—BURRSTONES, MILLSTONES, ETC.

The committee amendment places on the free list burrstones, which under the House bill and 1922 act were dutiable at 15 per cent ad valorm.

PARAGRAPH 1643.—TYPEWRITERS AND PARTS THEREOF

The transfer of the word "typewriters" from paragraph 1786 of the House bill this paragraph results in the transfer of parts of typewriters, such as ribbons and ribbon spools, from the dutiable list to this paragraph of the free list.

PARAGRAPH 1654.—COFFEE

Coffee is one of the most important industries in Porto Rico, and in order that she may have control of her domestic markets an exception has been made in this paragraph for coffee imported into Porto Rico and upon which a duty may be imposed by the Porto Rican Legislature under authority of section 319.

PARAGRAPH 1664.—METAL DROSSES

The new phraseology gives the term "metallic mineral substances in a crude state" a more definite meaning by the specification of certain metallurgical by-products.

The term "metals unwrought" is deleted, because most of the alloys and other materials now classified under such terms have been given specific mention in the chemical and metal schedules, and it is intended that such articles as ferroalloys not at present in use shall be dutiable under paragraph 302 as alloys not specially provided for, used in the manufacture of steel, or under other clauses of that paragraph, unless more specifically provided for in the dutiable schedule.

PARAGRAPH 1667.—CYANIDE

Sulphocyanide or thiocyanides, thiocyanates, nitroprussides, ferrocyanides, ferricyanides, and cyanates belong to classes chemically distinct and separate from the true cyanides, and have been specifically excluded from paragraph 1667, thus placing them in paragraph 5 at 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1682.—GAME ANIMALS AND BIRDS

The provision for free importation of game animals and birds for stocking purposes, which under the House bill was limited to United States or State game officials, is broadened to include importations made by any person under regulations of the Secretaries of the Treasury and of Agriculture. A provision has been added for the free entry of game animals and birds killed in foreign countries by residents of the United States.

PARAGRAPH 1687.—EXPLOSIVES

The phrase "and not wholly or in chief value of cellulose esters" has been inserted in paragraph 1687 in order to exclude from free entry sporting powders or any other explosives in chief value of cellulose esters, which includes the guncotton type now dutiable under paragraph 31 at 60 per cent ad valorem. This will also prevent importation of cellulose ester explosives, which are suitable either with or without chemical treatment for use in the preparation of low viscosity nitrated cotton for lacquers or other purposes.

PARAGRAPH 1692.—GRINDSTONES

The committee amendment places on the free list grindstones, which under the House bill and 1922 act are dutiable at $1.75 per ton.

PARAGRAPH 1703.—JUNK

The committee amendment strikes out the provision for free entry of old junk on account of numerous administrative difficulties in classifying articles under this paragraph. It is believed that any small item which, under existing law, falls under this paragraph, would under the committee amendment probably be classified as waste under paragraph 1555. In view of the fact that a small amount of tarred rope, not suitable for paper making and used for making oakum, is being imported, the committee amendment retains this on the free list as waste rope.

PARAGRAPH 1705.—KIESERITE

The committee amendment restores to the free list kieserite, which is free under the 1922 act, but which under the House bill is dutiable under paragraph 50 at one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

PARAGRAPH 1713.—MANGANESE ORES

The committee amendment makes free of duty manganese ores and manganese concentrates, which under the House bill and 1922 act were dutiable under paragraph 302, if containing in excess of 30 per cent of metallic manganese, at 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese.

PARAGRAPH 1723.—MUZZLE-LOADING FIREARMS

The committee amendment makes free of duty muzzle-loading firearms, which under the House bill and 1922 act are dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1725.—TRAWL NETS

The committee amendment strikes out the words "or vegetable fiber" for the purpose of preventing the free entry of nets, such as shrimp nets, of vegetable fiber other than manila, made on the otter trawl principle.

PARAGRAPH 1727.—OIL-BEARING SEEDS

Free entry is provided for kapok seed and rubber seed, which are oil-bearing seeds imported to a certain extent and not produced in this country.

PARAGRAPH 1728.—DRUGS

The committee amendment places on the free list gentian, sarsaparilla root, belladonna, digitalis, henbane, stramonium, and ergot, which under the 1922 act and the House bill are dutiable under paragraphs 36 and 37 at various rates.

PARAGRAPH 1732.—OILS, DISTILLED OR ESSENTIAL

The committee amendment places on the free list eucalyptus oil, which under the House bill and 1922 act was dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1733.—OILS, EXPRESSED OR EXTRACTED

The committee amendment places on the free list inedible rapeseed, sunflower, and sesame oils, which under the 1922 act and the House bill were dutiable at various rates.

The House bill and the existing law place on the free list Chinese and Japanese tung oils. The committee amendment makes free tung oil of whatever kind and from whatever country.

PARAGRAPH 1735.—NICKEL OXIDE

The committee amendment places on the free list nickel oxide, which under the 1922 act and the House bill is dutiable at 1 cent per pound.

PARAGRAPH 1738.—LONDON PURPLE

The committee amendment places on the free list London purple, which under the 1922 act and the House bill was dutiable at 15 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1753.—PATNA RICE

The House bill restricted the free importation of Patna rice to rice imported for use in soups. The wording of the act of 1922 is restored, since it appears that the same reasons for the free importation for soups apply to free importation for other canned foods.

PARAGRAPH 1757.—FROZEN SEA HERRING

Frozen sea herring has been transferred to the free list from the basket clause of paragraph 717 (a) because of the inadequate domestic production of sizes suitable for smoking.

PARAGRAPH 1758.—CHICKPEAS

Chickpeas or garbanzos are transferred to this paragraph of the free list from paragraph 767, since they are not produced commercially in this country. Cowpeas are also provided for here rather than in paragraph 768, since imports, other than blackeyes, which have been ruled to be dutiable as beans, are negligible.

PARAGRAPH 1761.—SHINGLES

The committee amendment restores to the free list shingles, which under the House bill were dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1767.—SODIUM NITRATE AND SALT CAKE

The words "crude or refined" have been inserted after the word "nitrate" in order to include in the free list all grades of nitrate of soda.

The word "crude" has been inserted before "salt cake" in order to confine paragraph 1767 to crude salt cake and to permit the classification of refined salt cake or sodium sulphate under paragraph 82.

PARAGRAPH 1775.—SILICA

By the insertion of the word "silica" in paragraph 1775, entry free of duty is provided for the classes of silica subject to duty under the provisions of paragraph 207 of existing law, as well as for all other commodities, not specially provided for, commercially or commonly known as silica.

PARAGRAPH 1782.—TAR AND PITCH

The committee amendment restores to the free list wood tar and pitch of wood, which under the House bill were dutiable at 1 cent per pound.

PARAGRAPH 1784.—IMPURE TEA

The committee amendment places on the free list impure tea, tea waste, and tea siftings and sweepings, which under the House bill and the 1922 act were dutiable at 1 cent per pound.

PARAGRAPH 1787.—ALLOYS OF TIN

Alloys in chief value of tin, which by the committee amendment are made free of duty under this paragraph, are under the 1922 act and the House bill free of duty as metals unwrought.

PARAGRAPH 1789.—TRUFFLES

Truffles have been transferred to the free list from paragraph 766, since they are not produced in the United States.

PARAGRAPH 1799.—TRAVELERS' EXEMPTION

The committee amendment increases from $100 to $200 the amount of personal or household effects or souvenirs admitted free of duty in case of returning residents to the United States.

PARAGRAPH 1802.—WITHERITE

The words "crude and unground" have been inserted after "witherite" in order to include in the free list only natural witherite not advanced in value or condition by grinding or pulverizing. Ground or pulverized witherite will be dutiable under paragraph 214 at 30 per cent ad valorem.

PARAGRAPH 1811.—STAINED-GLASS WINDOWS

The committee amendment removes from the free list stained or painted glass windows valued between $15 and $35 a square foot which are works of art and imported for use in churches.

PARAGRAPH 1812.—ANTIQUES

The committee amendment places on the free list rugs and carpets made in the year 1700 or prior years which are works of art, and takes off the free list all antiques made in the period between 1800 and the date of importation.

The committee amendment also places on the free list violins, violas, violoncellos, and double basses, made in the year 1800 or prior years.

PARAGRAPH 1813.—GOBELIN TAPESTRIES

The committee amendment places on the free list Gobelin tapestries used as wall hangings, manufactured under the direction and the control of the French Government.

VENETIAN GLASS MOSAICS

The committee amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill (par. 1807 of the House bill), placing on the free list Venetian glass mosaics which are works of art. The effect of the amendment is to make these articles dutiable at 60 per cent ad valorem.

TITLES III AND IV.—SPECIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

Your committee in its report upon the special and administrative provisions of the bill has, in general, adopted the policy of discussing only the changes proposed by it to the House bill. A discussion of the amendments made by the House to the existing law and unchanged in the bill as reported will be found under the appropriate headings on pages 158 to 187, inclusive, of the House report. (H. Rept. No. 7, 71st Congress, 1st sess.) However, in a few instances, where the subject was thought to be of such importance that it deserved special consideration, a discussion has been given of provisions in the House bill which are unaffected by the amendments reported by your committee.

SECTION 304.—MARKING

The existing law requires that all imported articles be marked to indicate the country of origin. The law authorizes no exceptions to be made. The House bill required the marking of every imported article and its immediate container, and delegated to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make such exceptions as he deemed advisable. The bill as reported provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may except any article from the marking requirements if he is satisfied that the article is incapable of being marked, or can not be marked without injury, or that the marking of the container alone will be a reasonably sufficient indication of the country of origin of the article. No authority is given to except the container from the requirement for marking, as it is not believed that any case will arise where such exception is required.

The manner of marking was left by the House bill entirely to the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury. Your committee is of the opinion that certain primary requirements of the existing law should be included, and has therefore written in the requirements that the marking must be in a conspicuous place and as nearly indelible and permanent as the nature of the article will permit.

Your committee believes that, in order to prevent the evasion of the marking provisions by subsequent covering or obscuring of the marks, the penalties provided in subdivision (b) of the section should apply to the covering or obscuring of any mark with intent to conceal the information given thereby, and has amended the subdivision accordingly.

SECTION 305.—IMMORAL ARTICLES

The existing law prohibits the importation of certain obscene or immoral matter, articles for the prevention of conception, and lottery tickets. The House bill contained, in addition to the language of the present law, a provision prohibiting the importation of any printed or written matter urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States, or containing a threat to take the life of or inflict bodily harm on the President of the United States. Your committee feels that such a threat against any other person in the United States is equally obnoxious and that the provision should not be limited to the President alone. The bill as reported extends the language to prohibit the importation of matter containing any such threat against any person in the United States.

SECTION 306.—PLANT QUARANTINE

Under the plant quarantine act of August 20, 1912, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to forbid the importation into the United States of any class of nursery stock and plant products whenever he determines this to be necessary in order to prevent the introduction into the United States of any plant disease or insect pest new to or not theretofore widely distributed through the United States. Pursuant to this authority the Secretary of Agriculture has placed an embargo upon numerous classes of nursery stock and plant products even though the particular articles are not so diseased or infested. In the opinion of the committee the result of the action of the Secretary of Agriculture has been the exclusion of plants and plant products to greater extent than Congress intended. To insure a proper construction of this act there has been inserted in section 306 a provision to the effect that the plant quarantine act shall not be construed to permit the exclusion of any of the articles to which it applies, unless such articles are infected with disease or infested with injurious insects new to or not widely prevalent within the United States, or unless the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that such articles are so infected or infested.

SECTION 307.—CONVICT-MADE GOODS

This section in the existing law and in the House bill prohibits the importation of goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor. Your committee believes that the policy of this section should apply not only to manufacture but also to any other process of production by convict labor; and the section in the bill as reported is amended to prohibit the importation of commodities mined or produced, as well as manufactured, wholly or in part by convict labor.

SECTION 308.—TEMPORARY FREE IMPORTATION

Section 308 in the 1922 act and in the House bill permits the importation of certain articles without payment of duty, under bond for exportation within a limited period. Your committee has added to the list articles imported by illustrators and photographers for use as models in illustrating catalogues and advertising matter. A considerable business has, for some years, been done by American commercial illustrating, printing, and lithographing concerns in the making of illustrations for catalogues and advertisements for Canadian and other foreign houses. Recently, however, the competition in this industry has become so keen that the American concerns are handicapped in getting business from foreign countries because they are required to pay duty on the article brought into the United States as a model from which the illustration is to be made. As articles imported under this section can not be sold but must be exported within a year at the most, no disadvantage to American manufacturers is involved.

SECTION 311.—BONDED MANUFACTURING WAREHOUSES

This section covers the manufacture of merchandise in bond for exportation without the payment of duty on the imported materials used, including among the processes covered the milling of flour from imported wheat. At present foreign wheat may be imported into the United States without the payment of duty, milled in bonded warehouse, and the flour exported. American millers are thereby enabled to mill Canadian wheat for the Cuban trade and to obtain the treaty preferential rate of duty into Cuba, with the natural result that the greater part of the flour sold in Cuba is of this class. Acting apparently upon the plea of the so-called southwestern millers, who are unable to carry on this trade to advantage largely because of transportation costs on the imported wheat, and certain of the wheat growers of the United States, the House inserted in this section a provision designed to prevent American millers of Canadian wheat from obtaining the benefit of the Cuban preferential rate on flour.

In the opinion of your committee this provision in the House bill would not materially benefit the southwestern millers. They would be unable to compete successfully with the Canadian millers of Canadian wheat, which is less expensive than American wheat and produces a flour particularly adapted to the Cuban demand. On the other hand, it would seem that the effect of the House provision would be to take the business from the American mills at Buffalo and other points on or near the Great Lakes and throw it to Canadian mills.

Your committee feels that the House amendment to the existing law would result in little or no benefit to any American farmers or millers and in very considerable harm to many millers. In the bill as reported it has, therefore, been eliminated.

SECTION 313.—DRAWBACK

The House bill contains an amendment to section 313 of the existing law corresponding to that made in section 311 relating to milling in bond, which would prevent the exportation with benefit of drawback of flour or by-products thereof produced from imported wheat. In conformity with the amendment made to section 311, the existing law has been restored in the bill as reported.

The House bill contains an amendment to existing law limiting the drawback privilege to articles exported within five years after the importation of the foreign merchandise. Your committee has reduced this period to three years, as had been provided in a Treasury regulation, declared invalid by the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. It would seem that three years is a reasonable and sufficient period within which to take advantage of the drawback privilege.

The House bill further provided that merchandise not conforming to sample or specification might be exported with benefit of drawback if returned to customs custody within 10 days after release. Your committee feels that in many cases this period would be too short, particularly where the importer was far removed from the port of entry, and has extended the time limit to 30 days.

The House bill contained a provision in subdivision (b) of section 313 authorizing substitution for drawback purposes in the case of sugar and nonferrous metals. The effect of the provision is to permit the substitution of duty-free or domestic sugar or nonferrous metal for imported merchandise of the same kind and quality, so that the exporter will be relieved from the requirement of the present law that proof be furnished that the imported merchandise has actually been used in the particular article that is exported. The total amount of drawback allowed upon the exportation of articles made with the use of imported and duty-free or domestic merchandise shall not exceed 99 per cent of the duty paid on the imported merchandise. Your committee believes that this provision is fair and just to manufacturers using these commodities and will result in no jeopardy to the revenues. It was urged before your committee that the privilege of substitution for drawback purposes should be made general. Your committee was not convinced of the soundness or the advisability of this proposition. The privilege is peculiarly adapted to the case of sugar and nonferrous metals, which are more or less stable commodities, and, moreover, the application of the drawback provisions of the existing law to these commodities has resulted in considerable hardship owing to the difficulty in establishing proof that imported merchandise is actually present in the exported article. For instance, an exporter of canned goods using both imported and domestic sugar must, in order to properly make proof, warehouse his imported sugar separately and use it exclusively, or have separate sirup vats for sirup made from imported sugar, and sirup made from domestic or duty-free sugar. Frequently, honest drawback claims on sugar and metal have been given up on account of the impossibility of making such proof. It may be that the administration of the provision in the case of sugar and nonferrous metal will demonstrate the practicability of making the privilege general at a future date.

SECTION 320.—RECIPROCAL AGREEMENTS RELATING TO ADVERTISING MATTER

Because the expense of collection in such cases would be out of proportion to the amounts of duties collected, our postal and customs regulations now provide that mail importations of less than $1 in value shall be passed free of duty. One of the consequences of this provision has of course been the free admission of circulars, cards, and other advertising matter under $1 in value, sent from foreign countries to separate addressees in the United States.

Your committee believes that, as a general rule, both foreign and domestic commerce is promoted by the free passage of advertising matter between countries of the world, without the obstructive effect of the collection of duty thereon. However, it has been brought to the attention of your committee that it is the practice of certain foreign countries to gather together all advertising matter sent by an American advertiser to separate addressees in any such country and to require the payment of duty by the person dispatching the same, before delivery is made. Thus, while the United States allows the free circularization of persons within its borders by foreign advertisers, an obstruction amounting almost to complete exclusion is in some cases placed upon the American advertiser when he attempts to reach persons without the United States.

As an attempt to arrive at a solution of this problem, the committee has inserted in the bill as section 320 a provision authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General to enter into a reciprocal agreement with any foreign country to provide for the entry, free of duty in the respective countries, of such advertising matter addressed to individual addressees, it being the expectation of your committee that, if it is found impossible to establish reciprocal free entry, the departments will by proper administrative action require the payment of duty upon advertising matter entering the United States.

A specific exception has been made in the case of matter printed or produced in a foreign country, advertising the sale of articles by persons carrying on business in the United States, or containing announcements relating to their business or merchandise. By the expedient of having the advertisements addressed and mailed from a foreign country to separate individual addressees in the United States, American merchants have found it possible in effect to defeat the provisions of the customs law requiring the payment of a duty on the imported matter. Your committee contemplates that this situation will be corrected administratively by appropriate regulations.

SECTIONS 330–335.—UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

Codification of existing law: The House felt that it was desirable to have all the provisions of law relating to the United States Tariff Commission incorporated in the tariff act of 1929 where they properly belong. Consequently, sections 700 to 709 of the revenue act of 1916, as amended, which provided for the organization, general powers, and procedure of the commission, and section 318 of the tariff act of 1922, which imposed certain additional duties upon the commission, have been incorporated in the bill with certain amendments as sections 330 to 335, inclusive, of Part II of Title III. Further, the so-called flexible tariff provisions, contained in section 315, together with sections 316 and 317, of the tariff act of 1922, have been incorporated as sections 336, 337, and 338 of the bill with certain amendments. With certain additional changes the committee proposes to retain this codification of the existing laws relating to the Tariff Commission.

Reorganization of Tariff Commission: The House bill proposed to reorganize the United States Tariff Commission. It changed existing law by providing for seven in lieu of six commissioners, and for appointments of nonpartisan in lieu of bipartisan character. Provision was also made for the appointment of commissioners on the basis of possession of qualifications requisite to develop expert knowledge of tariff problems and efficiency in administering the flexible tariff provisions. The committee has modified the House bill so as to retain the existing law providing for six bipartisan commissioners. Under the existing law the term of a commissioner is 12 years. The House bill provided for terms of seven years. The committee amendment proposes terms of six years, except that in case of the first six new appointees their terms are to be designated by the President at the time of nomination so as to expire one at the end of each of the first six years after the date of the enactment of the bill. The increase in salary of the commissioners to $12,000, as provided in the House bill, is retained.

General power, duties, and procedure of tariff commission: Sections 331 to 335, inclusive, of the bill relate to the powers, duties, and procedure of the commission. Except for the provision in section 331 increasing the salary of the secretary of the commission and making it specific instead of dependent upon the classification act of 1923, as amended, no changes in substance have been made in existing law with respect to these matters.

SECTION 336.—FLEXIBLE TARIFF PROVISIONS

Equalization of competitive conditions: In recognition of the obvious inability on the part of Congress to ascertain with exactness all the essential facts relating to the myriad items in a tariff act and to fix effective protective tariff rates to meet constantly changing competitive conditions, Congress in section 315 of the tariff act of 1922 empowered the President, after investigations by the Tariff Commission, to adjust and readjust the rates fixed by statute (subject to the limitations prescribed) so as to equalize foreign and domestic costs of production. Primarily such adjustments are to be made by increasing or decreasing within the prescribed limits the rates of duty expressly fixed by act of Congress, with or without incidental changes in classification when necessary properly to carry out the change in rates. Secondarily such adjustments are to be made by a change in the basis of valuation of the imported article to the American selling price of the domestic article with which the imported article competes and to which it is like or similar. In case of such change of basis of value no increases, but only decreases, in the rates of duty are permissible.

The purpose of Congress was analyzed by Chief Justice Taft in his opinion in the case of Hampton & Co. v. United States (276 U. S. 394, 404) sustaining the constitutionality of the section, in which he stated that the clear intent "was to secure by law the imposition of customs duties on articles of imported merchandise which should equal the difference between the cost of producing in a foreign country the articles in question and laying them down for sale in the United States and the cost of producing and selling like or similar articles in the United States, so that the duties not only secure revenue but at the same time enable domestic producers to compete on terms of equality with foreign producers in the markets of the United States."

A few difficulties which have arisen under the present law, however, must be removed if the expressed policy is to be put into force effectively. The ascertainment of costs of production has often required such prolonged investigations that necessary readjustments have been denied for two or three years. In many instances the commission has found it impossible to ascertain foreign costs of production, with the result that readjustments, the necessity for which was apparent and admitted, have been denied altogether. Again, it was found that costs of production alone did not accurately reflect competitive conditions and that equalizing costs of production would not be sufficient to avoid damaging competition to the country's industries. Foreign and domestic competition in the markets of the United States must be equalized.

Accordingly the House bill substitutes, as the principle to which the President must conform in carrying out the purpose of Congress, the equalization of "conditions of competition in the principal market or markets of the United States between domestic articles and like or similar competitive imported articles." Your committee approves this change, and it is believed that this standard will permit more speedy adjustments, that the conditions will always be ascertainable, and that the resulting changes in rates will conform more nearly to the acknowledged policy of the Congress.

Subdivision (d) of the section (following rather closely the provisions of section 315 (c) of the 1922 act) specifies certain factors to be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether or not the foreign and domestic articles are upon a competitive level in the domestic market. Inasmuch as all the factors specified may not be readily ascertainable or considered applicable in the case of a particular article, the subdivision is intended only as a general guide. For example, the cost of producing the domestic article and all the intervening costs involved in placing it upon the principal domestic wholesale market may be readily obtainable; while in the case of the foreign article it may be advisable to use its landed or import cost as a starting point, adding thereto such costs as are necessary to place it in a position comparable to that of the competing domestic article. On the other hand, it may seem more appropriate to use wholesale selling prices of both domestic and foreign articles, with such adjustments (either additions or subtractions) as may be necessary to place them upon the same competitive level. It is believed that the proposed provisions will prove much more effective and workable than the rigid provisions of existing law.

Transportation costs: The committee has retained substantially the flexible tariff provisions of the House bill, except that, in addition to minor clerical changes, the committee has inserted a definition of the term "costs of transportation." In the tariff act of 1922 costs of transportation were not defined. Differences in view as to what particular costs of transportation should be considered in administering the flexible tariff provisions of that act have given rise to several divided decisions by the Tariff Commission. Definition of the term "costs of transportation" is necessary, not only to prevent differences in the interpretation of the flexible tariff provisions and expedite their administration, but also in order to provide an accurate basis for consideration of a factor that may frequently be decisive in adjusting tariff rates on the basis of competitive conditions. The principal issue is whether transportation costs to the principal port of importation or to the principal domestic market should be used. In order that competitive conditions may be equalized in the principal market or markets of the United States for the competing imported and domestic articles, the committee is of the opinion that the imported article should be allowed costs of transportation from areas of substantial production in the principal competing foreign countries to the principal port of importation in the United States, and that the domestic article should be allowed the costs of transportation from areas of substantial production that can reasonably be expected to ship the article to such principal port of importation. Any other solution would deny to domestic articles the ability to compete in the markets along the coastal areas of our most populous States. The committee amendment carrying out the above policy will be found in subdivision (g) (7) of section 336.

Export taxes: The consideration to be given export taxes imposed by the country of exportation of the article is left to the sound discretion of the commission in giving consideration to "other costs" (subdivision (d) (3)). In order to equalize competitive conditions it may in some cases be found feasible to include the export duty as a factor in determining differences in such conditions. This would occur, for instance, where the export tax is imposed solely for revenue purposes. On the other hand, export taxes should be excluded in determining such differences when they in effect unfairly discriminate against the industries or commerce of the United States. Export taxes should likewise be excluded when they place an American consumer of a product at a disadvantage as compared to consumers of exporting countries or are employed as a means of restricting the supply of an essential raw material.

Existing limitations upon adjustment of duties retained: The section also provides that an article may not be transferred from the dutiable list to the free list, or vice versa, that the form of duty fixed by statute may not be changed, and that the increased or decreased duty may not exceed 50 per cent of the existing rates. There has been no change in existing law with respect to these matters.

Principal competing country: Certain definitions are included in the section to aid the commission in carrying out its provsions, particularly with respect to determining the principal competing country and the articles which are like or similar to and competitive with the domestic articles. In ascertaining the principal competing country with respect to any imported article the President shall take into consideration the quantity, value, and quality of the article imported from each competitive country and any other differences in the conditions under which the article imported from each such country competes with the like or similar competitive domestic article. For example, it is contemplated that whenever the imported article is the product of, or is placed on sale by, an organization, association, combination, or cartel of producers or manufacturers whose plants or factories are located in more than one foreign country, the principal competing country shall be considered to be that country associated with the organization, association, combination, or cartel which is shown by the investigation herein provided for, to offer the greatest competition with the like or similar competitive article of the United States.

Pending proceedings: The section also provides for dismissing without prejudice all investigations instituted under existing law and for preserving the information and evidence secured by the commission for consideration in subsequent proceedings. The committee believes that this is a necessary provision in view of the fact that it is proposed to change the standard to be applied in future investigations.

SECTION 337.—UNFAIR PRACTICES IN IMPORT TRADE

This section (which is taken from section 316 of the tariff act of 1922) declares to be unlawful unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation and sale in the United States of foreign articles, the effect or tendency of which is (1) to destroy or substantially injure, or to prevent the establishment of, an industry efficiently and economically operated, or (2) to restrain or monopolize trade or commerce. If the President is satisfied that such unfair methods or acts exist, he is authorized to exclude from entry into the United States the articles concerned in such unfair methods or acts.

Under the existing law as retained by the House bill, the Tariff Commission makes a preliminary adjudication as to the existence, with respect to any article, of unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in the importation of the article. An appeal thereon may be taken to the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals and the section purports to authorize a review upon certiorari by the United States Supreme Court. However, under the existing law the President is in no wise bound by any decision of the courts in the matter. As a result of this lack of finality to the decison of the Supreme Court, appellate proceedings before it upon writ of certiorari do not present a "case or controversy" within the meaning of Article III of the Constitution. Such proceedings are, therefore, of such character that Congress can not constitutionally give the court jurisdiction over them. Compare, Keller v. Potomac Electric Power Co. (1923), 261 U. S. 428; and Postum Cereal Co. v. California Fig Nut Co. (1927), 272 U. S. 693; In re Bakelite Corporation (1929), 49 L. ed. (advance sheets), 36 and 411. The committee has, therefore, omitted the provisions of law giving jurisdiction to the United States Supreme Court upon certiorari, and made the determination of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals the only appellate proceeding. The latter court, being a "legislative" court and not a "constitutional" court, may receive this jurisdiction of a proceeding the judgment in which is merely advisory to discretionary action by the President. This is true even though the same jurisdiction can not be validly conferred upon the United States Supreme Court. See the cases above cited.

The committee has also made a minor amendment to the section making it mandatory for the Secretary of the Treasury to admit upon bond, pending the completion of proceedings under the section, articles believed to be connected with unfair methods of competition and unfair acts in their importation into the United States.

In addition to the above changes a modification of the existing law was also proposed by the House bill, namely, the elimination of the provision which authorizes the President to impose such additional duties, not in excess of 50 per cent or less than 10 per cent of the value of the article imported in violation of the section, as would offset the unfair method or act employed. This provision should be eliminated for the reason that the imposition of penalty duties to offset violations is entirely inadequate to prevent further violations. The effective remedy is to exclude from entry the articles concerned in the violation. The committee, therefore, proposes to retain the provisions of the House bill eliminating the penalty duties.

SECTION 338.—DISCRIMINATION BY FOREIGN COUNTRIES

This section authorizes the President to proclaim new and additional duties upon articles of a foreign country, or imported in its vessels, if he finds that such country discriminates, directly or indirectly, against articles or commerce of the United States. It is further provided that if the discriminations are maintained or increased after a proclamation by the President, he may exclude such articles from entry. If the articles to be excluded from entry are actually imported, they are to be subject to forfeiture.

The only substantial change made by the House bill over existing law is the extension of its application to articles imported in vessels of a foreign country which discriminates against articles and commerce of the United States. It is believed that there may be less likelihood of such discriminatory practices by a foreign country if retaliatory measures may be taken which will affect the maritime interests of such country.

SECTION 340.—DOMESTIC VALUE—CONVERSION OF RATES

It has been urged upon the Congress repeatedly for many years that the basis upon which the value of imported merchandise is appraised should be changed. However, each tariff act has retained the foreign-value basis, primarily, it is believed, because of the fact that adequate information had never been available for proper conversion to a domestic value. It is also believed that many of the proposals were misunderstood and thought to be concealed efforts to obtain increased rates of duty. An additional administrative objection has been present in prior attempts to shift the basis, for every method has always contemplated an immediate change in all schedules, without adequate preparation on the part of customs officials.

Your committee believes that the value of merchandise in the United States will be a more effective basis. All possible international difficulties will be removed. All necessary investigations may be made in the United States. All pertinent information will be available in the United States. Furthermore, present inequalities between high-cost and low-cost foreign countries should be almost entirely eliminated.

In order to gain the many advantages of a domestic-value basis, in order that sound and proper rates may be ascertained which will neither increase nor decrease the rates based upon foreign values, and in order that proper administrative preparation may be made, your committee recommends the adoption of a new section (sec. 340), directing the Tariff Commission to convert the rates imposed by the present bill to rates based upon "domestic value" as defined by the section. The commission is directed to report back to Congress on or before January 1, 1932, the result of its work, and Congress will then be in a position to make the desirable shift to the domestic-value basis.

The work of the commission will be based upon weighted averages in respect to merchandise imported during the fiscal years 1928 and 1929 (or during a representative portion of this period). In many of the cases the commission will use final appraised values of the imported merchandise as reported to it. However, if the commission determines that there has been undervaluation, it may determine foreign values for itself.

The House bill provided (sec. 642) for an investigation by the President, through such agencies as he might designate or appoint, of bases for valuation of imported merchandise, with a view to determining the advisability of using domestic values, and for a report back to Congress. Inasmuch as your committee believes that a domestic-value basis is proper, it believes such an investigation by the President to be unnecessary.

It will be noted that the definition of domestic value in the section is substantially the same as the definition of "United States value" in section 402 (d) of the bill as reported to the Senate, except that no deductions are made for transportation costs, commissions, profits, duty, and other expenses and costs. It is believed that the elimination of these deductions will greatly simplify administration. Obviously, if the conversion is properly made, the elimination of the deductions will not result in any change in the amount of duty to be collected.

SECTION 402.—VALUE

The present law provides that the basis upon which the value of imported merchandise is to be appraised shall be:

"(1) The foreign value or the export value, whichever is higher;

"(2) If neither the foreign value nor the export value can be ascertained to the satisfaction of the appraising officers, then the United States value;

"(3) If neither the foreign value, the export value, nor the United States value can be ascertained to the satisfaction of the appraising officers, then the cost of production."

Briefly, "foreign value" is the freely offered wholesale price of "such or similar" merchandise in the country of exportation.

"Export value" is the freely offered wholesale price of "such or similar" merchandise, in the country of exportation, for exportation to the United States.

"United States value" is the freely offered wholesale price of "such or similar" merchandise, in the principal market of the United States, with deductions for duty, a commission (not to exceed 6 per cent) or profits (not to exceed 8 per cent), and certain costs and expenses.

"Cost of production" is the cost of producing the imported article abroad, with an addition for profit.

Difficulties encountered in the administration of the present law may be briefly summarized as follows:

(1) Adequate investigations in foreign countries have been hampered because of actual or threatened international difficulties;

(2) In many instances, a "United States value," as at present defined, can not be ascertained and the use of cost of production results in a lesser duty. Consequently, concealment of foreign values may be advantageous to the importer;

(3) Decisions of the appraising officers that foreign or export values could not be satisfactorily ascertained have been reversed by the Customs Court by reason of the introduction of evidence not presented to the appraisers and which the Treasury has no opportunity to check, or the acceptance of evidence, such as unverified affidavits of persons abroad, which the appraisers have rejected primarily because prior experience or other information establishes the unreliability of the evidence.

The House bill attempted to meet the difficulties of the present law by placing responsibility directly upon the importer to produce satisfactory evidence of foreign or export values (sec. 402 (b)), making the determination of the appraiser that foreign or export value could not be ascertained final and conclusive, subject only to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury; by specifically giving in the statute a prima facie effect to the decisions of the appraising officers of the Treasury; and by enlarging the definition of United States value.

Your committee believes that practically all the international difficulties which have arisen have been based upon a lack of understanding and an unwarranted misapprehension as to the necessity for customs investigations abroad and the results to be accomplished by them. Since the passage of the bill by the House, however, substantial progress has been made toward amicable and satisfactory adjustments of the international difficulties, affording adequate opportunity for foreign investigations. Furthermore, greater consideration has been shown in the trial of cases, in granting requests for postponement until adequate opportunity for checking foreign affidavits has been given and in sustaining objections of Government counsel to the admission of foreign affidavits executed in countries in which adequate investigation and check has been impossible. Consequently, your committee recommends the elimination of section 402 (b).

The provision of the House bill giving a prima facie effect to the action of the customs appraisers, coupled with a rephrasing of section 402 (a) (2) and (3), is retained. It is believed that the number of reversals by the Customs Court of appraiser's decisions will be thereby reduced.

The revised definition of "United States value" contained in the House bill is retained, with two changes. In order to make certain that due consideration will be given by the appraisers to all the differences between the particular imported merchandise and the comparable merchandise being used as a basis, the provision of the House bill is extended to include differences in size, material, construction, and texture, as well as any other differences. Inasmuch as comparable imported merchandise will, in the absence of "such or similar" imported merchandise, ordinarily be used as a basis, rather than comparable domestic merchandise, because of the fact that fewer adjustments will in all probability have to be made, the order of the phrase "whether domestic or imported" has been transposed to read "whether imported or domestic." It should be pointed out, however, that an appraisal should not be reversed merely because a more comparable article could have been found and used. The questions on a reappraisement proceeding should be confined to the propriety of the adjustments made. If proper adjustments are made, the true value of the particular imported merchandise under appraisement will be ascertained.

The House bill did not provide for an allowance for duty, in the event that a comparable domestic article was used as the basis for determining the value of the imported merchandise under appraisement. Under the present law, domestic merchandise can not be used as a basis for determining value. The allowances under the present law are determined by the facts applicable to the merchandise used as a basis. For example, if the merchandise used as a basis was purchased, then a deduction is made for profits and general expenses, even though the particular imported merchandise under appraisement was consigned and a commission paid; and the deduction for transportation is determined by the transportation costs of the imported merchandise used as a basis. This practice under existing law seems to your committee to be sound and no change is recommended. However, in case comparable domestic merchandise is used as a basis, the allowable deductions, which should include duty, must be determined by the facts applicable to the particular imported merchandise under appraisement. Accordingly your committee recommends an amendment under which (in addition to such adjustments as may be necessary owing to differences) allowance will be made, on the price of the domestic merchandise, for the cost of transportation and insurance of the imported merchandise, the other necessary expenses from the place of shipment of the imported merchandise to the place of its delivery, a commission not exceeding 6 per cent if a commission has been paid or contracted to be paid on the imported merchandise (or profits not to exceed 8 per cent and general expenses not to exceed 8 per cent if the imported merchandise has been purchased), and the amount of duty to be paid on the imported merchandise.

Your committee has devoted considerable time to the consideration of the definitions of value and the proposals to change the basis of value. As a result, your committee has recommended the adoption of section 340 of the bill as reported to the Senate, providing for a conversion of the rates fixed by the bill to rates based on domestic value, the conversion to be made by the Tariff Commission and the result of its work to be reported to the Congress. This section of the bill is proposed as a substitute for section 642 of the bill as it passed the House. A more complete discussion of this subject will be found under section 340.

SECTION 466.—EQUIPMENT AND REPAIR OF VESSELS

Section 466 of the 1922 act amended sections 3114 and 3115 of the Revised Statutes, relating to equipment and repairs of vessels. Section 3114 as so amended provided for the payment of a duty of 50 per cent of the cost of equipment purchased or repairs made in a foreign country by a United States vessel. Section 3115 provided for the remission or refund of such duties upon showing that the vessel, while in the regular course of her voyage, was compelled by stress of weather or other casualty to put into a foreign port and purchase such equipment or make such repairs to enable her to reach her destination in safety. The House bill rewrote this provision so as to allow a greater latitude in the making of repairs and purchase of equipment abroad and subsequent entry thereof free of duty. In effect the provision as rewritten would permit almost any sort of operation short of general overhauling or reconditioning to be carried on in a foreign port without the payment of duty upon entry of the vessel in the United States. Your committee believes that such a provision would be too much of a detriment to American shipyards, and that the present law affords sufficiently generous treatment to American shipping interests. Accordingly, in the bill as reported, the provision in the 1922 act has been restored.

The House bill carries an additional amendment exempting from duty equipment purchased or repairs made in a foreign port, where it is shown that the equipment or repair parts were manufactured in the United States and were installed by American labor. This provision has been retained in the bill as reported by your committee.

SECTIONS 483 AND 484.—CONSIGNEE AS OWNER OF MERCHANDISE; ENTRY OF MERCHANDISE

The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, accompanying the House bill, states the situation now existing under these sections in the 1922 act, and the resulting difficulties, as follows:

"Section 483 provides that merchandise shall, for the purposes of Title IV, be held to be the property of the person to whom it is consigned, and the holder of a bill of lading indorsed by the consignee therein named, or if consigned to order, by the consignor, shall be deemed the consignee. Section 484 provides that the consignee shall produce the bill of lading at the time of making entry. The Federal and State courts have held in several cases that under these provisions collectors of customs are personally liable for any damage resulting from the delivery or release of merchandise without the production of the original bill of lading by the person making entry. For their own protection, therefore, most collectors require the original bill of lading to be filed with the entry and retained in their custody. Importers and carriers object, the former on the ground that the original bill of lading is needed to obtain possession of the goods from the carrier, and the latter that they must have the original bill for their own protection in the event a claim is filed for wrongful delivery.

"In many shipments in the ordinary course of trade the original bill of lading can not be obtained at the time of making entry, being held in the possession of a bank against payment of the purchase price of the merchandise, or delayed in transit, or otherwise unavailable within the time prescribed for making entry. This general problem has resulted in varying practices at different ports of entry, where collectors have endeavored to make some arrangement whereby the deadlock could be avoided. This lack of uniformity of practice in itself is not desirable."

The House bill sought to remedy the difficulty by amending the sections to provide that a person in possession of a duplicate bill of lading properly authenticated might make entry for merchandise. Your committee is advised that the amendment will cover a number of cases, particularly those arising on the Canadian border, but is not sufficient to cover all cases because of the difficulty, in through shipments from distant foreign countries, in obtaining duplicate bills of lading to be used for this purpose.

Accordingly your committee has revised and elaborated the House amendment so as to permit two alternative methods of making entry where the original bill of lading is not presented. In subdivision (h) of section 484 of the bill as reported by your committee, it is provided that any person certified by the carrier to be the owner or consignee of the merchandise, or an agent of such owner or consignee, may make entry therefor. In subdivision (i) the duplicate bill of lading provision appears substantially as inserted by the House.

An additional subdivision (sec. 484 (j)) has been added to relieve collectors of customs from the necessity of ascertaining the particular person to whom delivery of merchandise should be made by providing that, except in the case of entry for warehouse (with which no difficulties culty has been experienced), merchandise for which entry has been made under the provisions of section 484 shall be released from customs custody only to the carrier by whom the merchandise was brought to the port at which the entry was made. The collector is expressly exempted from liability in all cases in which he complies with the provisions of this section.

In view of the addition of the new matter in section 484, paragraph (2) of section 483 of the House bill has been rewritten.

SECTIONS 501, 515, AND 516.—INTERVENTION BY AMERICAN INDUSTRY AND AMERICAN LABOR

Your committee is firmly convinced of the soundness of the principle that one of the primary purposes of any tariff law should be to encourage the industries of the United States and to protect American labor, and that in the enactment of a protective tariff law the Congress so intends. In general it may be said that this salutary purpose is principally consummated with the enactment of the dutiable schedules, which should be based upon a consideration of the degree of protection necessary to prevent injury to American industry and unemployment of American labor. However, it is obvious that proper protection will not prevail unless the rate schedules are strictly and effectively enforced by the courts. It follows that American industry and American labor are equally concerned with the very important administrative sections of a tariff act. It is true that American manufacturers may cooperate with the Government officers charged with the enforcement of the law and the protection of the interests of the Government in the conduct of cases before the Customs Court. They may furnish witnesses and produce evidence of various kinds for the use of Government counsel; they may, perhaps, suggest to the Government counsel a method for the conduct of the case; they may furnish information that only those familiar with the details of the particular industry can give. But they have no standing in court, except in the cases provided in section 516 of the tariff act of 1922. They make no oral argument, may not cross-examine witnesses, and have no part in the actual conduct of the trial. Section 516 for the first time recognized that the American producer has an interest in appraisement and classification of imported merchandise. It was there provided that the domestic manufacturer might protest against the appraisement or classification of merchandise of a class or kind produced by him. It is believed that the right to originate the proceeding under this section should be equally afforded to the representatives of American labor. Labor has just as vital an interest in these cases as has industry. Section 516 has been amended accordingly.

The right afforded under section 516 was, and probably properly so, since there the domestic interest originates the proceeding, strictly limited and in the last analysis requires considerable time for its effective consummation. Your committee believes that section 516, while it serves a very useful purpose in the law, and should be retained, is not of itself sufficient to afford the domestic manufacturer and domestic labor their proper place in the decision of cases involving the imposition of customs duties and the consequent protection of American labor and industry. Accordingly, it is proposed that the domestic manufacturer and the representative of domestic labor be allowed to appear as a party in interest in any reappraisement proceeding under section 501 and in any protest against the collector's decision under section 515. In other words, in any case in which the importer challenges the appraisement or classification made by the customs officers it shall be competent for the domestic manufacturer and the representative of domestic labor to appear as a party in interest to assist the court in arriving at a proper construction of the law and to insure the protection of American industry and American labor as contemplated in the rate schedules. Your committee does not, however, propose that domestic interests shall come in unchecked, with possible ensuing delay in court proceedings and vexation of the importer. Such representation is to be granted only with the permission of the court, granted in its discretion and under such rules as the court may prescribe. It is believed that there will be no considerable increase in litigation, but that domestic interests will be afforded only the opportunity to which they are entitled to demand a voice in the maintenance of the standard of protection which the Congress has provided. They are as vitally concerned in the imposition of customs duties as are the importers. It is to their interest that the duties levied by the Congress, and none other, should be imposed. Your committee has therefore amended sections 501 and 515, relating to reappraisement proceedings and protest against the collector's decision, respectively, to permit the domestic manufacturer and the representative of domestic labor to appear as a party in interest in those proceedings, strictly safeguarded by the discretionary power granted to the Customs Court.

SECTIONS 503 AND 504.—TIME FOR APPRAISER'S RETURN; BASIS OF VALUE

The House bill contained a provision, new to the customs laws, requiring that the appraiser make his report of value to the collector within 120 days after the entry of merchandise, unless a longer time should be allowed by the Secretary of the Treasury in any particular case. Your committee is advised that the cases in which a proper investigation and report of value can not be made within 120 days may be so numerous as to render the provision inadvisable. Accordingly, section 503 of the House bill has been omitted from the bill as reported. Subdivision (c) of section 504 of the House bill contained new matter inserted by the House as a corresponding amendment, providing that in case the return was not made within the period prescribed the entered value should be taken as the final appraised value. This subdivision has, of course, been stricken out.

SECTION 518.—UNITED STATES CUSTOMS COURT

Under the present law the expenses of the Customs Court, including the payment of the salaries of the judges and clerical and other assistance, are paid from the appropriation for the collection of the revenue from customs. All recommendations for appointment, promotion, or otherwise affecting the clerical force are made by the chief justice of the United States Customs Court, but the appointments are, as a matter of law, made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Your committee believes that the functions now exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the appointment of clerks and other employees of the Customs Court and with respect to the records and other property of the court are properly within the scope of the functions of the Attorney General rather than the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the appropriation for the Customs Court should be under the Department of Justice. Your committee has, therefore, recommended that the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the Customs Court should be transferred to the Attorney General, and that hereafter the appropriation for the Customs Court should be expended by the Department of Justice.

SECTION 526.—MERCHANDISE BEARING AMERICAN TRADE-MARK OR PATENT NOTICE

Section 526 of the House bill contained substantially the same provisions as the corresponding section in the 1922 act. The section prohibited the importation of merchandise bearing an American trade-mark unless written consent of the owner of the trade-mark was produced at the time of making entry. Your committee believes that where the laws of the United States protect the interest of a trade-mark holder by allowing him a monopoly in the use of the mark, it is reasonable to require, so far as practicable, that, in return, the holder of the trade-mark shall manufacture his goods in the United States. Accordingly, the provision allowing importation of goods bearing an American trade-mark, upon written consent of the owner of the trade-mark, is eliminated from the section.

Pursuant to the same policy, a provision has been inserted by your committee, as subdivision (b) of the same section, to provide that no merchandise of foreign manufacture claiming the benefit and protection of the United States patent laws shall be imported.

Section 4900 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, requires that merchandise made under an American patent shall bear a notice to that effect and, in the event that such notice is not affixed, the patentee can recover no damages for infringement unless he can prove that the infringer had actual notice of the patent. In order that too great a burden may not be placed upon collectors of customs in determining what merchandise must be excluded as patented under the laws of the United States, the provision in the reported bill takes the form of a prohibition against the importation of any merchandise of foreign manufacture if such merchandise or the package in which it is inclosed is marked or labeled in accordance with the provisions of section 4900 of the Revised Statutes, as amended.

SECTION 527.—IMPORTATION OF WILD MAMMALS AND BIRDS

The House bill contained a new provision prohibiting the importation of wild mammals or birds, or parts or products thereof, unless accompanied by the certification of an American consul that such articles have not been acquired or exported in violation of the laws of the country from which they come. Your committee feels that this provision partakes of the nature of an attempt to enforce the laws of foreign countries in respect of matters of their internal policy, and while it may not be proper to encourage any such violation, to take such drastic measures as contemplated by the House provision extends beyond the proper purpose of the bill. Accordingly, the section has been stricken from the bill as reported by your committee.

SECTION 584.—FALSITY OR LACK OF MANIFEST; PENALTIES

Section 584 of the House bill contained an amendment to the existing law, providing that the owner of a vessel or vehicle should be liable to penalties if any merchandise is found on board such vessel or vehicle not described in the manifest or if any merchandise described in the manifest is not found on board the vessel or vehicle. The existing law imposes a penalty only upon the master or the person in charge. A further amendment in the House bill removed the immunity from the liens for penalties contained in existing law in case of vessels or vehicles of common carriers, so far as such immunity relates to smoking opium. Under the present law, the penalties constitute a lien upon the vessel of a common carrier only if it appears that the owner or master of the vessel or the person in charge of the vehicle consented to the illegal act or had knowledge thereof.

Your committee believes that the amendments to the existing law contained in this section of the House bill would result in an injustice to shipowners and the owners of vehicles, in cases in which, in spite of the best intentions and greatest care on the part of such owners, the vessels or vehicles were involved in violations of the law. With perhaps rare exceptions common carriers cooperate to the fullest extent with Government officials in the prevention of opium smuggling and, on their own part, have developed efficient and thorough inspection services. The amendments above referred to have, therefore, been eliminated and the present law restored.

SECTION 611.—SALE OF FORFEITED MERCHANDISE

Under the present law, when any vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage is forfeited by court proceedings for violation of the customs laws, it must be sold by the marshal of the court in which the forfeiture is had. The marshal's power in this respect does not extend beyond the district. It has, therefore, been impossible in some cases to sell to advantage articles forfeited in districts in which there was no demand for merchandise of that class. Your committee therefore recommends an amendment to section 611 of the House bill providing that upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury the court in forfeiture proceedings may provide that the vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage forfeited shall be delivered to the Secretary of the Treasury for disposition in accordance with the provisions of law.

SECTION 619.—AWARD OF COMPENSATION TO INFORMERS

Section 619 of the present law, contained in the House bill, authorizes the payment to informers of a compensation of 25 per cent of the net amount of any duties, fee, penalty, or forfeiture recovered as a result of their action in seizing and detecting any vessel, vehicle, merchandise, or baggage subject to seizure and forfeiture, or in furnishing original information to the customs officers. The present law provides that the necessary moneys to pay such compensation shall be paid out of moneys appropriated for that purpose. The House bill amended this provision by making a permanent and indefinite appropriation for the purpose. Your committee believes that increase in the number of permanent and indefinite appropriations should be carefully limited. While, as suggested in the House report, it may be impossible to estimate accurately in advance how much will be necessary for the purpose of paying compensation to informers, and while in some cases it may be true that persons will hesitate to take advantage of the opportunities afforded in section 619 by reason of the fact that appropriations may not be immediately available to pay their compensation, your committee believes that, with the direction in the law that the compensation shall be paid, no difficulty should be encountered in getting a deficiency appropriation to make up any deficit in the current appropriations. It is not believed that the circumstances warrant the adoption of a permanent and indefinite appropriation. The present law, which requires estimates in advance and specific appropriation for the payment of compensation to informers, has therefore been restored.

SECTION 623.—BONDS

Section 623 of the House bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury by regulations to require or to authorize collectors to require such bonds or other security as might be deemed necessary for the protection of the revenue and to assure compliance with the customs laws and regulations. In conformity with this provision a number of specific provisions in Titles III and IV of the 1922 act requiring bonds in particular cases were eliminated. The new provision will authorize the requirement of a bond where it is not specifically required by law, but will not permit of the waiving of the requirement of the bond where an expressed requirement occurs. Your committee believes that this provision will greatly facilitate the administration of the customs laws in that it will make for uniformity as well as flexibility in bond requirements, and will permit the doing away with bonds in many cases in which experience has shown or will show them to be unnecessary. It is believed that there will develop comparatively few situations, if any, in which a bond is not required by the present law, but in which a bond will be required under the new regulations. Generally speaking, it may be said that the question of the necessity for bond is a question peculiarly one for the determination of administrative officers. Your committee, therefore, approves the provisions as written in the House bill.

SECTION 642.—INVESTIGATION OF METHODS OF VALUATION

A discussion of this section and the substitute for it recommended by your committee will be found under section 340 of the bill as reported to the Senate.

SECTION 643.—APPLICATION OF AIR COMMERCE ACT

Section 644 of the House bill provides in substance that the customs provisions contained in the bill shall be subject to application to civil air navigation by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury under the authority of section 7 of the air commerce act of 1926. As that act also grants authority to the Secretary of Commerce to provide similarly for the application to air navigation of the laws relating to entry and clearance of vessels, some provisions of which are contained in the bill, your committee deems it advisable to broaden this section to cover both situations. It has been rewritten accordingly.

SECTION 644.—TRAVEL AND SUBSISTENCE

Customs officers and employees traveling to or from foreign stations or from one foreign station to another are entitled under existing law to an allowance for their expenses, subject to a per diem limitation. However, while the officers and employees of other departments are entitled to an allowance for the traveling and subsistence expenses of their families upon such transfers, the existing law contains no similar provision with respect to customs officers and employees. The House bill, in section 645, provided for the reenactment of section 5 of the act of March 4, 1923, relating to allowances for expenses of the officers and employees themselves, with an amendment to include the travel and subsistence expenses of their families upon foreign transfers. As rewritten the section also authorized the payment of expense of transporting the remains of officers and employees who die abroad and the expense of interment. Your committee is entirely in accord with the policy of these amendments. However, in order to avoid any possible doubt arising from the reenactment of this section of the application of the limitations contained in the subsistence expense act of 1926, which has superseded the act of 1923 in this respect, it is thought advisable to accomplish the object of the amendment by a separate provision covering the new matter only.

In the bill as reported by your committee, therefore, subdivision (a) of section 644 provides for the allowance of the expenses of the families of customs officers and employees upon such transfers within the discretion and under written orders of the Secretary of the Treasury and also for the expenses of transporting the remains of customs officers and employees who die while in or in transit to foreign countries to their former homes in the United States for interment, together with the expenses of such interment.

Section 5 of the act of March 4, 1923, above referred to, limits to 5,000 pounds the amount of household effects and personal property for the transfer of which allowance may be made. No such limitation exists in respect of officers and employees of other departments in similar cases. Your committee believes that the limitation should be removed and has inserted as subdivision (b) of section 644 a provision to that effect.

Under the present law no allowance may be credited for travel or shipping expenses incurred on a foreign ship by a customs officer or employee except upon proof satisfactory to the Comptroller General of the necessity of incurring such expenses. In many cases it has been found impossible to make such proof since it involves proof that no United States vessel was available. Inasmuch as the protection of the revenue requires prompt action on the part of customs officers, employees, and agents, it seems desirable to leave the determination of the necessity of using a foreign vessel to the Secretary of the Treasury. Accordingly, your committee has added subdivision (c) to section 644 of the bill requiring the crediting of allowances in such cases if the Secretary of the Treasury certifies to the Comptroller General that transportation on such foreign ship was necessary to protect the revenue.

SECTION 646.—REVIEW OF DECISIONS OF COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS

Section 195 of the Judicial Code provides that final decisions of the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, in cases appealed from the Customs Court, may be reviewed by the Supreme Court upon application by either party, in any case in which a constitutional or treaty question is involved, or in any other case if the Attorney General of the United States files a certificate to the effect that the case is of such importance as to render expedient its review by the Supreme Court. The effect of this limitation on the classes of cases which may be reviewed is to make the right of one party to a review dependent upon the will of the other party. Your committee, while it is advised that no injustice has been done importers or other private parties by making their right to appeal dependent upon the decision of the Attorney General, believes that as a matter of principle this arrangement is objectionable. There is, therefore, inserted as subdivision (a) of section 646, in the bill as reported, a provision repealing this limitation upon the right to petition for review, the result of such repeal being to permit either party to apply in his own discretion.

Subdivision (b) of the new section expressly extends the right to apply for review by the Supreme Court to American manufacturers, producers, or wholesalers and to representatives of American labor organizations, or labor associations, appearing as parties in interest in proceedings in court in accordance with the privilege extended to them by the amendments to sections 501, 515, and 516 of the bill, elsewhere discussed.

SECTION 647.—UNCERTIFIED CHECKS, UNITED STATES NOTES, AND NATIONAL-BANK NOTES RECEIVABLE FOR CUSTOMS DUTIES

Under existing law uncertified checks, United States notes, and national-bank notes are not receivable for duties on imports. United States notes and national-bank notes are receivable for other public dues, and uncertified checks are receivable in payment of internal-revenue taxes. However, your committee is advised that upon the resumption of specie payments, January 1, 1879, United States notes were accepted in payment of customs duties and have been freely received on that account since, although the law has not been changed. In view of the resumption of specie payments and the act of March 14, 1900, making it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain at a parity of value with the gold dollar all forms of money issued by the United States, there would seem to be no good reason why the law should not provide that United States notes and national-bank notes should be receivable for duties on imports. In the case of uncertified checks your committee believes that they, too, should be receivable with proper safeguards to the revenue in case the check is not paid by the bank on which it is drawn. Accordingly, it is provided in section 647 that collectors of customs may accept uncertified checks, United States notes, and national-bank notes in payment of duties on imports, during such time and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. If a check so received is not paid by the bank the person tendering the check shall remain liable for the payment of duties and all legal penalties and additions to the same extent as if the check had not been tendered.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. It is a resolution authorizing the printing of 5,000 extra copies of the tariff bill as reported. Generally, this is done under a concurrent resolution. When the tariff act of 1922 was reported we had 8,000 copies printed for the House and 5,000 copies printed for the Senate. There were not half of those copies used, and eventually we had to dispose of them as waste paper. The resolution which I have submitted is a Senate resolution providing for the printing of only 5,000 additional copies, which we are authorized to have printed under the law. I am quite certain that we shall be able to send to the House a considerable number of copies of the Senate print and thus save to that extent the printing by the House. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 105), as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, as reported to the Senate, be printed as a Senate document with an index, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed for the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of my colleague whether it would not be wise to defer the printing until the bill can be printed showing the original law, the House amendments, and the Senate committee amendments all in one print?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is customary to print the bill as reported from the Finance Committee. These copies are distributed and, among other places, go to the libraries in the country. The print of the act of 1922, together with the amendments made in the House and the amendments made by the Senate, was for the use of the Senate only. There is no necessity to send copies of such a print to the libraries. Copies of the bill as I have asked to have it printed go to the libraries and are usually asked for by the business men of the country. The print to which my colleague refers is generally used here on the floor of the Senate only, and usually we print only about 1,000 copies of it for that reason.

Mr. KING. I had the question of economy in mind and thought that one print would serve the purpose. I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does not the senior Senator from Utah think he is assuming a good deal to assume that the libraries will want copies of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. The law requires it, and therefore we are going to print it. Consequently I do not, of course, have to assume that they desire to have it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I rise simply for the purpose of saying that the minority members of the Finance Committee, who, as is generally known, were not permitted to participate in the executive sessions of the majority when the amendments to the bill were prepared, have decided not to submit any minority report. This does not mean that we are not thoroughly opposed to the bill and to many of the amendments made by the majority of the committee. It means simply that we will hold in abeyance our attitude with reference to the different items in the bill until the debate is begun or until the individual items are reached.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLEASE:

A bill (S. 1579) governing the competency of the husband or wife of the accused as a witness in any criminal prosecution or contempt proceeding under any statute of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FESS (for Mr. ODDIE):

A bill (S. 1580) to provide for an examination and survey to determine the feasibility of irrigation development in the Humboldt River watershed in the State of Nevada; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 1581) granting an increase of pension to Nancy Ellen Derickson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BLAINE:

A bill (S. 1582) granting a pension to Emmett G. Newman (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GREENE:

A bill (S. 1583) granting an increase of pension to Ellen Mador; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BORAH:

A bill (S. 1584) granting a pension to Mary Hermo (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 1585) granting an increase of pension to Cora L. Vickery (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 1586) to create a department of public education, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 1587) granting a pension to Frances M. Barnes; and

A bill (S. 1588) granting a pension to Hattie McDaniel; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 1589) for the relief of Preston Brooks Massey; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1590) for the relief of William P. Howard;

A bill (S. 1591) for the relief of Lamar Jamerson; and

A bill (S. 1592) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend certain War Department equipment to the Quitman Chapter, United Daughters of the Confederacy, for use at the Confederate soldiers' reunion at Quitman, Ga., October 8 and 9, 1929; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BLEASE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 66) to extend the provisions of Public Resolution No. 92, Seventieth Congress, approved February 25, 1929, as extended by Public Resolution No. 2, Seventy-first Congress, approved May 17, 1929; to the Committee on Finance.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) requesting the President and the Secretary of State to submit a proposal to the governments of the various nations for the negotiation of treaties for the promotion of international good will and the establishment of permanent peace; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PUBLICITY FOR INCOME-TAX RETURNS

Mr. BLAINE. I introduce a joint resolution which I send to the desk. I request that the joint resolution be read and that it be printed and lie on the table.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 68) providing for suspension of the secrecy of income-tax returns was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That during the pendency of the tariff bill before Congress, all returns of income taxes of corporations, and all papers, schedules, and reports filed therewith or relating thereto, shall be available to each member of Congress and the committees thereof, for their inspection and examination and use, in the consideration of said tariff bill; and it is further provided that any Member of Congress or a committee thereof may designate in writing any person or persons to inspect and examine any of said income-tax returns, and said papers, schedules, and reports, and furnish to such Member or committee the information obtained therefrom; be it further

Resolved, That any law contrary to the foregoing provisions is hereby suspended until final disposition of the tariff bill by the Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I heard the reading of the joint resolution just introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] with a great deal of interest. The joint resolution, however, can not become operative until it shall have been concurred in by the House of Representatives. We desire the information for which it calls earlier, if we can get it, than the time fixed for the reassembling of the House of Representatives; and I wish to give notice that I have prepared, and now hold in my hand, a resolution which I think, if adopted, will obtain for us, without action by the other House, substantially the same information as that sought by the joint resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin. My resolution, if adopted, will instruct the Finance Committee to apply to the Tariff Commission or to the Treasury Department or to both for the desired information.

AMENDMENTS TO THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted seven amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR TYSON

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 106), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. Lawrence D. Tyson, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state to the Senator from Tennessee that the resolution, under the rule, must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it will be so referred.

FEDERAL JURIES IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. BLEASE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 107), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, or a duly constituted subcommittee thereof, be, and they are hereby authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the ways and means and methods that are now, and have been for the past five years, employed in filling Federal jury boxes and panels and in the drawing of Federal jurors in both the eastern and western districts of the United States courts for the State of South Carolina, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the officials and persons charged with the duties thereof have duly observed and complied fully with the provisions of law relating thereto, and to report thereon to the Senate as soon as practicable.

Resolved further, That for the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized and directed to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts, clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require by subpœna or otherwise, and such is hereby directed, the attendance of the two United States district attorneys, the two United States marshals, the two United States clerks of court, for South Carolina, and of such other witnesses, and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and to take such testimony, and make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee, which shall not be in excess of $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

WILLIAM B. SHEARER

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for just a moment. I notice by the public press that a suit has been filed in New York by William B. Shearer to recover some $250,000 which he alleges to be due him by reason of services which he rendered to certain shipbuilding companies at the Geneva naval conference. According to the item of news he was employed by certain shipbuilding companies to represent them at the Geneva naval conference; he had been paid some $50,000, and some $250,000 is still due on the contract. Those who are familiar with the history of the Geneva naval conference and the kind of propaganda that was sent out, and who know something of the activities of Mr. Shearer in connection with it, must necessarily be deeply interested to know what his relation in connection with those shipbuilding companies is and was at the time.

It also appears that the same shipbuilding companies or some of them have since received contracts from the Government to build certain ships, the construction of which might possibly have been avoided if the Geneva naval conference had been successful.

It seems to me that this is a matter about which we ought to have some more information, and I ask the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] if the Naval Affairs Committee will make some inquiries into the facts relating to the subject?

Mr. HALE. Yes. Does the Senator from Idaho propose to offer a resolution and have it referred to the Naval Affairs Committee?

Mr. BORAH. I have prepared a resolution, but I thought I would offer the resolution only in case the Senator thought his committee would not be interested without having the subject brought before them in that manner.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will call the committee together, and we shall be very glad to look into the subject.

Mr. BORAH. I will defer offering the resolution until the committee shall have made its report.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The Chief Clerk announced the first bill on the calendar, which was Senate bill 168.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the leader upon the other side if it is the intention to have the Senate's attention distracted from the consideration of the tariff bill by taking up the calendar of measures which may have come over from the session heretofore held?

Mr. WATSON. I had a talk this morning with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] who is in charge of the unfinished business, Senate Joint Resolution No. 53, that measure having been introduced by him. I am trying to find out what disposition he desires to have made of it.

Mr. KING. I may say that I hope the Senator will not ask to take up the calendar to-day. Speaking for myself, there are some measures there which I think ought to receive consideration at the hands of the Senate, and we are not in a position now to take them up and discuss them.

Mr. WATSON. What I intended to do was to move to proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. The unfinished business was under consideration the last day before the recess was taken in June, and we were about ready for a vote on the joint resolution to carry out recommendations of the President to create a joint congressional committee on prohibition enforcement, but an amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] the consideration of which was not completed. I have spoken to that Senator with reference to withdrawing his amendment. I should like to see the joint resolution passed, but, if it is going to lead to further discussion, of course I would have to let it go over, not only on account of the tariff bill but on account of my own physical condition. The Senator from Missouri has asked that the unfinished business go over until to-morrow that he may have an opportunity to consider the disposition of his amendment. So I ask that the unfinished business may go over until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate sundry messages from the President transmitting Executive nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees and which appear at the end of to-day's proceedings.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. WATSON. As in open legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow, the adjournment being until 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 5, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

THURSDAY, September 5, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Infinite and gracious God, our Heavenly Father, ever near to us and always ready to help those who put their trust in Thee, incline Thine ear unto us. Make us more eager to do Thy will and more susceptible to heavenly influences. With clear vision and firm, unfaltering footsteps may we go forward with the duties of the hour, leaving the final issues of life to Thee, who doeth all things well; and to Thee shall be the glory and honor and praise forever. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 18, 1929:

S. 1452. An act to authorize the State of West Virginia to acquire a bridge over the Kanawha River at Cabin Creek in said State and to acquire the right to construct a bridge over said river at or near St. Albans in said State.

On June 20, 1929:

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT—LETTER OF AUSTEN G. FOX

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an open letter sent by Austen G. Fox, a distinguished citizen of the State of New York, to the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

SIR: A citizen finds in the first amendment to the Constitution his right "to petition the Government for the redress of grievances." Plainly it is the Executive alone who can put an end to the shocking and increasing assassinations of citizens by agents of the Federal Government. With the power that alone can put an end to grievances rests, also, the responsibility for their continuance. Who can doubt the abiding truth in the following statement:

"Our Government is the potent, the omnipresent teacher. * * * Crime is contagious. If the Government becomes a lawbreaker it breeds contempt for law; * * * it invites anarchy." (Mr. Justice Brandeis in Olmstead v. United States, 72 L. Ed. 944.)

Yesterday F. Scott McBride, general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, in its "first general survey of prohibition since the inauguration of President Hoover," said: "Scores of Federal officials * * * have adopted a more aggressive policy." The same day we read also the story of the killing in Minnesota, the latest result of this "more aggressive policy."

Last month large numbers rose in the House from their worship at the altar of law enforcement and shouted their glee at the news that another fellow citizen had been shot to death, this time on the streets of the National Capital. To-day we read that they all sat silent under the denunciation of the killing of the day before.

The Minnesota assassin took no chance of missing his victim. He used a "riot gun," put 26 bullets into the automobile, killed his man, and barely missed two children and their mother.

Too long has this "more aggressive policy" resulted in assassination on land and sea. The men who put "riot guns" in the hands of the men whom they send to "patrol" the highways and the Great Lakes or the sea are removable, every one of them, by the President.

Read the news from International Falls, Minn., to-day:

"Citizens of the town gathered in groups about the jail and discussed the advisability of going armed when motoring to protect themselves against similar attack."

With "border patrolmen armed with .45-caliber pistols and repeating shotguns on the highway tourists * * * are leaving for their homes." The assassin White was reported as "still on the Government pay roll last night."

In closing I repeat the words of warning that these assassinations by Federal agents are the very thing that "lead to anarchy." Make no mistake, Mr. President. When citizens arm in common defense against officers of the Federal Government who shoot at will is it anarchy or is it revolt? It was your immediate predecessor who told the American Bar Association that attempts to force an unacceptable law on an unwilling people would "end only in revolt."

AUSTEN G. FOX.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. KING. I send to the desk and ask to have printed and referred to the appropriate committee a bill granting certain unreserved and unappropriated public lands to the several States.

I would like to say that a similar measure was introduced by me in the House years ago and at nearly every session of the Congress since I have been in the Senate. In view of the attitude of the President, which seems to indicate that he favors, so far as we can judge from newspaper reports, a cession to the States of certain of the public lands and with certain reservations, I feel that it is an opportune time to press the question of an unrestricted cession of the public domains to the several States.

As corollary to that I introduce another bill to establish a branch of the Department of the Interior in one of the public-land States, to transfer to such branch certain bureaus and offices of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 1593) granting certain unreserved and unappropriated public lands to the several States; and

A bill (S. 1594) to establish a branch of the Department of the Interior in one of the public-land States, to transfer to such branch certain bureaus and offices of the Department of the Interior, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. GLENN:

A bill (S. 1595) granting a pension to Amanda Kniseley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKHART:

A bill (S. 1596) granting an increase of pension to Edith Engle (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 1597) granting an increase of pension to Florence A. Martin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 1598) granting an increase of pension to Alfred Haught; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 1599) for the relief of Fred W. Boschen, lieutenant colonel, Finance Department, United States Army; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1600) to authorize the removal of the Aqueduct Bridge crossing the Potomac River from Georgetown, D. C., to Rosslyn, Va.;

A bill (S. 1601) to authorize the exchange of certain lands adjoining the Catoosa Springs (Ga.) target range;

A bill (S. 1602) to provide for the care of private battlefield memorials in Europe;

A bill (S. 1603) to provide for the exchange of lands of the United States in the Philippine Islands for lands of the Philippine government;

A bill (S. 1604) to amend the act entitled "An act to discontinue certain reports now required by law to be made to Congress," approved May 29, 1928;

A bill (S. 1605) to authorize the Secretary of War to resell the undisposed of portion of Camp Taylor, Ky., approximately 328 acres, and to also authorize the appraisal of property disposed of under authority contained in the acts of Congress approved July 9, 1918, and July 11, 1919, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 1606) to amend an act entitled "An act to define the terms 'child' and 'children' as used in the acts of May 18, 1920, and June 10, 1922," approved February 21, 1929; and

A bill (S. 1607) to authorize the President to class as secret certain material, apparatus, or equipment for military and naval use, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 69) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive, for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Edmundo Valdez Murillo, a citizen of Ecuador; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO TARIFF BILL—AVOCADOS AND MANGOES

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read by the clerk a short letter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., August 31, 1929.

To All Members of the Senate of the United States:

The special session of the Congress was called for the particular purpose of granting to agriculture tariff equality with industry. The Congress thus far has lost sight of or disregarded this fact. It has so readjusted industrial tariff rates as to make the inequality between industry and agriculture greater than ever before. The proposed tariff schedules are, therefore, absolutely unsatisfactory to agriculture.

We demand that you exercise every effort to limit the action of the Congress to the purpose for which the session was called, and that unless the tariff readjustments made by the Congress are confined to agricultural products no changes be made in the present tariff schedules.

THE MINNESOTA FARM BUREAU,
By A. J. OLSON, President.
LAND O'LAKES CREAMERIES (INC.),
By JOHN BRANDT, President.
CENTRAL COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
By CHAS. CRANDALL, President.
TWIN CITY MILK PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION,
By W. S. MOSCRIP, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will lie on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Minneapolis Tribune relative to the pending tariff measure.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Minneapolis Tribune, Monday, September 2, 1929]

THE FARMERS THEMSELVES ARE NOT FOOLED BY THE BILL

It is an authoritative and arresting document which Minnesota's four great cooperative associations have just sent to the Senators at Washington. The Land O'Lakes Creameries, the Central Cooperative Association, the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, and the Twin City Milk Producers' Association certainly have the right to speak for Minnesota agriculture. They represent about 150,000 Minnesota farmers, not to speak of an added 25,000 non-Minnesota Northwest farmers.

Their letter to the Senators runs as follows:

"The special session of the Congress was called for the particular purpose of granting to agriculture tariff equality with industry. The Congress has thus far lost sight of or disregarded this fact. It has so readjusted industrial tariff rates as to make the inequality between industry and agriculture greater than ever before. The proposed tariff schedules are, therefore, absolutely unsatisfactory to agriculture.

"We demand that you exercise every effort to limit the action of the Congress to the purpose for which the session was called, and that, unless readjustments made are confined to agricultural products, no changes be made in the present tariff schedules."

Here is a sound and dignified position. Minnesota's leading agricultural cooperative associations have no illusions about the tariff bill as it stands at present. They understand fully that the few dollars per year which the average Minnesota farmer might gain in cattle, cream, and hides would not compensate him for the added costs imposed upon him by the nonagricultural increases. The cooperative associations decline to countenance a farce. They either want a literal fulfillment of the party pledges or no tariff revision at all. The special session, to them, was a carriage for agriculture. Rather than stand by and watch industry push agriculture out of the carriage and go riding down the street in state they would dismiss the carriage and put an end to the preposterous performance once and for all.

The few Northwest newspapers and individuals that have sought to convince the Minnesota farmers of the Smoot-Hawley bill's rare virtues have made no impression upon these great cooperative associations. In these cooperative associations is reflected the considered and matured views of the farmers themselves. These associations have studied the bill, item by item, and know whereof they speak. They have the best interests of the farmer at heart. They would hardly take so decisive an attitude toward the bill if they believed it improved the farmer's status in the slightest degree. Their investigations have led them to conclude that the bill is a sham and a fraud. In its present form they have no interest in it whatsoever. Their feeling about it is substantially the same as the Tribune's, namely, that Congress is simply insulting this section of the country by offering it such a measure as a fulfillment of the Republican Party's pledges. We are glad to hear our cooperative associations speak up, and without mincing words. Their words should set at rest any lingering senatorial notions that Minnesota agriculture is at all fooled by the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate authorized the printing of 5,000 copies of the pending tariff bill, but it did not include a similar number of copies of the report. The limitation imposed by the rule would not allow me to provide in the resolution yesterday for the printing of the report. The officials in the House document room have already called attention to the fact that they ought to have the report in connection with the bill. Therefore I ask that there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the report of the committee on the tariff bill of 1929.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 37, accompanying the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk and I ask to have printed an amendment to the pending tariff bill. If I may have the indulgence of the Senate for a moment I shall read one or two sentences, which will be explanatory of the scope of the proposed amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. The proposed amendment provides that—

The United States Tariff Commission is hereby continued, but shall, after the approval of this act, be an agency in the legislative branch of the Government to aid the Congress in the exercise of its legislative functions relating to customs duties.

The amendment carries with it a provision repealing sections 315, 316, and 317 of the Fordney-McCumber Act, which provide the flexible tariff provisions, and it makes some further changes in existing law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

INCOME-TAX AND CAPITAL-STOCK-TAX RETURNS

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to offer a Senate resolution, which I send to the desk and ask the clerk to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 108), as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is directed forthwith to request the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to the authority vested in it under the internal revenue laws, to furnish the committee at the earliest practicable date a statement in detail for each of the taxable years 1922 to 1928, inclusive, of the profits or losses, as the case may be, of the taxpayers whose names the committee, or the majority or minority members thereof, may from time to time during the consideration by the Congress of the pending tariff legislation transmit to the Secretary as being the names of taxpayers whose products or manufactures are, in the opinion of the committee, or of the majority or minority members thereof, affected by the pending tariff legislation in so far as such profits or losses are contained in or shown by the income tax and capital-stock tax returns of such taxpayers, segregated, so far as may be practicable, to show the profits or losses, as the case may be, in the several branches or departments of the business of such taxpayers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to have immediate action upon my resolution, because it is very important that the information desired should be in possession of the committee as soon as possible; but I will not ask for present consideration if there is any objection whatsoever.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WATSON. I object to the present consideration of the resolution. I do not object to debating it, but I think under the agreement we have that no vote shall be taken upon any question affecting the tariff and no discussion until next Monday, perhaps to act upon the resolution would be a violation of that agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be if there is any objection and, therefore, if there is any objection, I will not press the resolution at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina whether, if the information is thus presented to the committee or to the minority or majority members thereof, it will be available to other Senators?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am afraid that I may have somewhat misled Senators in regard to that by some answers which I made to inquiries on yesterday. I had not at that time very carefully investigated the act under which the Senate committee is authorized to elicit the information. A careful investigation of the act shows that whatever information is obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to a resolution by the committee will be in the hands of the committee, and they are authorized to put that information in the possession of the two Houses of Congress. I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have him read the marked portions of the revenue act of 1926 to which I refer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

(b) (1) The Secretary and any officer or employee of the Treasury Department, upon request from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or a select committee of the Senate or House specially authorized to investigate returns by a resolution of the Senate or House, or a joint committee so authorized by concurrent resolution, shall furnish such committee sitting in executive session with any data of any character contained in or shown by any return.

* * * * * * *

(b) (3) Any relevant or useful information thus obtained may be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the House, or to both the Senate and the House, as the case may be.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina if his resolution is broad enough to include those portions of the income-tax returns which show the amount of wages paid during the years indicated in the resolution?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President; the resolution is not addressed to the subject of wages, but only to the subject of profit and loss as disclosed by the income-tax returns.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the title of the tariff bill specifically states that one of its purposes is "to protect American labor." Is it not very essential for the Senate to be informed of the amount of wages that are paid to workers in industry in order to ascertain whether or not the title of the tariff bill is honest or a mere camouflage, a mere pretense?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no question about that, Mr. President; the Senator is entirely right about it; but I wished to conform my resolution to the authority vested in the committee by the revenue act of 1926 for the purpose of securing action by the Senate instead of so broadening it as to make it necessary to have concurrent action by the House.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like further to inquire of the Senator if he would have any objection to an amendment which would include full information as to all details, knowledge as to which is necessary for a genuine understanding in the forthcoming tariff discussion, of the economic conditions of industry and labor? I understand that under the statute any information contained in the returns may be obtained by the Finance Committee; that is, there is justification for asking for all information. Is it not desirable to have all the information that is necessary and essential for a full consideration of the tariff schedules?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, undoubtedly the Senator is right; it is necessary; but here is an expressed authority conferred upon the committee, and the Senate has the right to instruct the committee to exercise the functions with which they are invested by that act. If we had gone farther than that, I think we would have had to draft the resolution in the form of a joint resolution. If the Senator will prepare a resolution of the character which he indicates, I shall be very glad to give it my hearty support; but I am afraid that such an amendment attached to the resolution I have offered might affect the power of the Senate to act alone in this behalf.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I should like to make one further inquiry. Under the resolution proposed by the Senator is it discretionary with the Finance Committee whether it will submit to the Senate the information it obtains from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the only question which under the resolution is lodged in the discretion of the committee. The committee, as a committee, under this resolution would have to ask for the information desired, whether it would be asked for by the full committee or by a majority of the committee or by a minority of the committee; but when it comes to the question of whether the committee will submit the information it obtains to the Senate, there is no special authority in the resolution as to that. I thought it best to leave that in the discretion of the committee, assuming that if the committee should secure the information it would not exercise a discretion to deny the Members of the Senate the benefit of the information.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he might offer his resolution as a separate one to-day and have it come up on Monday when the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina will come up, or after that resolution shall have been acted upon.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to suggest that as to the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin that an attempt will be made to bring it before the Senate in due course of time; but in view of the suggestion made by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that there has been a sort of understanding arrived at that no vote will be taken to-day, and, in fact, no debate until next Monday, I will not press the consideration of that resolution until that time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator's resolution cover the matters which he has suggested to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BLAINE. It fully covers the matters suggested in my inquiries to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HEFLIN. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I think the resolution offered by the Senator from Wisconsin on yesterday was a very proper one, and I would have been glad then to have given it my support; but it was a joint resolution, and we could not get action upon it until the House should concur in it, and the President should sign it. If the Senator from Wisconsin will draw his resolution so as to include wages paid, I will be glad to vote for it in that form, or in its less restricted form, because I should like very much to have the full information the Senator from Wisconsin desires. My resolution is not antagonistic to the views of the Senator, but is designed simply to secure immediate action, so that we may get these returns at once.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator, has he any doubt whether the committee, when it obtains the information, will give it to each and every Member of the Senate who may desire it?

Mr. SIMMONS. As I have said, that is in the discretion of the committee, and I am afraid if I took that out of the discretion of the committee I might possibly be going a little too far. I assume, however, if the committee asks for the information—and, of course, it will if this resolution shall be adopted—and secures the information, that the committee will not withhold it from the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. They would not withhold it from the Members of the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume that they would not exercise the discretion in that way.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator is right about it, but I should like to know what the other members of the committee think about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If they should do that, we could pass a supplementary resolution. I should not like to encumber the present proposition with anything that might preclude the Senate from action without the consent of the other House.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understand the resolution refers to taxpayers. That would include individuals as well as corporations, would it not? There is no doubt as to that, is there?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no doubt at all as to that.

REFERENCE OF EXECUTIVE MESSAGES

Mr. WATSON. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the order which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the order.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That on calendar days of the balance of the first session of the Seventy-first Congress, when Executive messages transmitting nominations or treaties are received and there is no executive session of the Senate, the President of the Senate is authorized, unless objection is made, to refer to the proper committees, as in executive session, such messages with the accompanying nominations or treaties.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana will yield to me for a moment, I desire to suggest that similar orders have heretofore been adopted, and such an order was in force during the last session.

Mr. WATSON. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the present consideration and adoption of the order.

There being no objection, the order was considered by unanimous consent and adopted.

S. A. SMITH AND FRANK B. SMITH

Mr. WATSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 109), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1929, to S. A. Smith and Frank B. Smith, sons and sole heirs of Samuel R. Smith, late a messenger in the employ of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

ATLANTA F. CANNON

Mr. WATSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 110), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1929, to Atlanta F. Cannon, widow of Thomas P. Cannon, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the unfinished business of the Senate is Senate Joint Resolution 53, providing for a joint commission of Senators and Representatives to look into the matter of the transfer of the Prohibition Unit, together with allied activities, to the Department of Justice. That joint resolution was under discussion all day at the close of the session before the recess was taken in June, and we were about ready for a vote. An amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES]. The Senator from Missouri writes me—and I have his letter here—that he does not care to press that amendment.

I hope we may pass this joint resolution. It simply provides for a joint commission of Senators and Representatives. I can see how some may think that the joint resolution is not really necessary, but certainly there can be no objection to it. The President sent a special message to Congress asking for its passage, and I hope it may be passed with the amendments recommended by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator whether he thinks it would be wise or prudent to take action upon the joint resolution, in view of the fact that the President some time ago appointed a commission for the purpose of making investigations in regard to the question of prohibition and all cognate matters?

Mr. JONES. The Senator refers to the general commission, I understand?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I think so. The President sent his message after that was done. He considers this a separate and distinct proposition, and I think expects and would like to have it considered separately, with a view to having recommendations submitted to Congress early in the regular session, in order that prompt action may be taken. Of course, if there is objection, or any serious discussion, I shall have to let the joint resolution go over.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The statement has been made, though as to its responsibility I know nothing, that in view of the fact that this joint resolution was not passed two months ago, when it was first reported, the administration had arranged to get the desired information through the departments. It has had two months in which to do that. I should like to ask the Senator if he knows anything about that.

Mr. JONES. I have not been advised of any action along that line.

Mr. GLASS. In view of the fact that the Senator is not advised, I think the joint resolution had better go over until next week. I have no disposition to obstruct it, but the very definite statement was made in the public prints that in view of the fact that action had not been taken on the joint resolution, arrangements had been made to obtain the necessary information from the department heads.

Mr. JONES. If it may go over until Monday morning without being displaced, in the meantime I will try to find out whether any action has been taken along that line.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

REFERENCE OF EXECUTIVE MESSAGES

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the terms of the order agreed to to-day, the Chair refers to their appropriate committees sundry messages from the President transmitting Executive nominations.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. WATSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 9, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

MONDAY, September 9, 1929

Rev. George G. Culbertson, associate minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

We lift our prayer in thankfulness, O Lord, our God, for the manifold blessings of life—for the high ideals and heroism which moved our fathers in the founding of our Government, for the wisdom of its conception, for its lofty purpose to guarantee to every citizen life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Make us faithful servants of this people and of Thee, that life may indeed be fuller, liberty truer, and happiness more complete. To the honor and glory of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. WATSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I present the certificate of appointment of the Hon. W. E. BROCK, Senator designate from the State of Tennessee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The certificate of appointment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials, as follows:

THE STATE OF TENNESSEE,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that whereas under chapter 8, section 3 of the first extra session of the legislature of 1913, the governor is authorized to appoint a Senator in the Congress of the United States, and a vacancy occurring caused by the failure of Col. Luke Lea to accept the appointment of the vacancy made by the death of Senator L. D. Tyson, and having confidence in the ability and integrity of Hon. W. E. BROCK, of Chattanooga, Tenn.,

Now, therefore, I, Henry H. Horton, Governor of the State of Tennessee, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested, do commission Hon. W. E. BROCK, to fill said office of Senator in the Congress of the United States until his successor is elected and qualified, agreeably to the Constitution and laws, during the term, with all the powers, privileges, and emoluments thereunto, appertaining by law.

In testimony whereof, I, Henry H. Horton, governor as aforesaid, have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed at the department in Nashville on this 2d day of September, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] HENRY H. HORTON,
Governor.

ERNEST N. HASTON,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The certificate of appointment will be placed on file.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator designate is in the Chamber, and I ask that the oath of office may be administered to him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator designate will come forward and the oath of office will be administered.

Mr. BROCK, escorted by Mr. McKELLAR, advanced to the Vice President's desk; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Vice President, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit a resolution of the highest privilege, which I send to the desk, and I ask that it may be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 111), as follows:

Whereas on the 17th day of May, 1926, the Senate passed a resolution creating a special committee to investigate and determine the improper use of money to promote the nomination or election of persons to the United States Senate and the employment of certain other corrupt and unlawful means to secure such nomination or election; and

Whereas said committee, in the discharge of its duties, notified WILLIAM S. VARE, of Pennsylvania, then a candidate for the United States Senate from that State, of its proceedings, and the said WILLIAM S. VARE appeared in person and by attorney before said committee while it was engaged in making such investigation; and

Whereas the said committee, in its report to the Senate (Rept. No. 1197, pt. 2, 69th Cong.), found that the evidence, without substantial dispute, showed that at the primary election at which the said WILLIAM S. VARE was alleged to have been nominated as a candidate for the United States Senate there were numerous and various instances of fraud and corruption in behalf of the candidacy of the said WILLIAM S. VARE; that there was spent in behalf of the said WILLIAM S. VARE in said primary election, by the said WILLIAM S. VARE and his friends a sum of money exceeding $785,000; and that the said WILLIAM S. VARE had in no manner controverted the truth of the foregoing facts, although full and complete opportunity had been given him not only to present evidence but arguments in his behalf; and

Whereas in the consideration of said report, on the 9th day of December, 1927, the Senate, by solemn declaration, declared "That the expenditure of such a large sum of money to secure the nomination of the said WILLIAM S. VARE as a candidate for the United States Senate prima facie is contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the dignity and honor of the Senate, dangerous to the perpetuity of a free government, and, together with the charges of corruption and fraud made in the report of said committee, and substantiated by the evidence taken by said committee, prima facie taints with fraud and corruption the credentials of the said WILLIAM S. VARE for a seat in the United States Senate"; and thereupon the Senate referred the claim of the said WILLIAM S. VARE to a seat in the United States Senate to the said committee with instructions to grant such further hearing to the said WILLIAM S. VARE and to take such further evidence on its own motion as it deemed proper in the premises; and

Whereas the said committee, having complied with the direction of the Senate, has made a further report to the Senate (Rept. No. 1858, 70th Cong., 2d sess.) of its doings in the premises. From said report and the evidence taken by the committee it appears that the evidence as to fraud and corruption in said primary election has not been refuted and the same stands as it did when the committee filed its partial report to the Senate (Rept. No. 1197, 69th Cong.); and

Whereas the said committee, from the foregoing facts and conclusions, including those previously reported in regard to said primary election, has reported to the Senate (Rept. No. 1858, 70th Cong., 2d sess., p. 15) that the said WILLIAM S. VARE is not entitled to a seat in the United States Senate; and

Whereas the Senate has delayed action upon said report on account of the illness of the said WILLIAM S. VARE; and

Whereas the said WILLIAM S. VARE has recovered from said illness and no further reason exists for longer delay on the part of the Senate: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said report (S. Rept. No. 1858, 70th Cong., 2d sess.) be, and the same is hereby, approved and adopted; and be it further

Resolved, That the said WILLIAM S. VARE be, and he is hereby, denied a seat in the United States Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, under the rule I ask that the resolution may go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I am of the opinion that there is no rule which would require it to go over. However, I have no objection to its going over if anyone wants time on it. It is a resolution of the highest privilege.

I would like to say that the resolution in substance was offered at the time the special committee made its report. It was not acted on at that time because Mr. VARE was ill and while that was no real reason why it should be postponed everyone felt that on account of his illness we ought to let it go over. From the public press and various other sources it is evident that he has recovered his health and there is no reason why the matter should be longer delayed; at least there ought to be action on it. I am not particular about having the Senate act to-day. I wonder if we could not have an agreement that we will take it up and dispose of it to-morrow?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. When the Senator speaks of "the committee" I gather that he refers to what was spoken of as the Reed committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Not the regular Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Before which committee there is pending a formal contest instituted by Mr. Wilson.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand so.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. A subcommittee was appointed which has had the matter under consideration. Whether the subcommittee is ready now to report I am not presently advised.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from California that this has nothing whatever to do with the contest of Mr. Wilson. The committee referred to by me was known as the Reed committee. When Senator Reed went out of the Senate the Senate elected the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to fill his place on that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. As I said, I have no objection to its going over; but I do not like to have that kind of a record made. Does the Chair hold——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that without objection the resolution goes over. If the question were submitted to the Chair, the Chair would hold that the matter is of the highest privilege, and under the rule should be disposed of at once.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all I care about at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION, 1932—ADDRESS BY SENATOR FESS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have here a copy of a very able address delivered by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] over the Star national radio forum on Saturday, September 7, 1929, on the George Washington bicentennial celebration. It has great historical value and is illuminating as to the celebration which will be held in 1932. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Senator FESS's address is as follows:

Plans are rapidly taking shape for the most ambitious celebration ever undertaken in honor of an individual on the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington in 1932. This celebration will not only be nation-wide, participated in by every section of the country, but it is expected to reach an international stage where other countries, recognizing the service of Washington to the world, will participate. The event will be observed in a suitable manner in every American embassy, under the direction of the American minister, and in cooperation with the nation to which he is accredited.

I am asked by the Evening Star, under whose auspices I am speaking, to tell the radio audience something of the plans and the reasons which will justify such an undertaking. This I am glad to do, and I thank the Star for the opportunity.

The year 1932 will mark the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. These two centuries span a period of time during which there has been greater progress in all lines of activity and more accomplished for the good of mankind than in any 2,000 years preceding it. In no part of the globe has that progress been so marked nor has it even approached the strides taken in the country he founded. Could he return to take part in the celebration of the bicentenary of his birth he would witness such changes as were never seen before by human eyes.

It would be difficult to properly estimate the contribution of General Washington to his country as known to-day. The trackless wilderness through which he carried his message at the opening of the French and Indian War, when he was but 21 years of age, has become the heart of a great empire, with her teeming cities, her fertile farms, and her beautiful homes, occupied by a prosperous population. He would observe the thirteen separate original Colonies stretching along the seaboard, whose independence he had succeeded in winning and whose hopeless anarchy he banished through constitutional government, adding State after State until 35 more sovereign States extended her borders from sea to sea to cover the choice portion of a continent.

The 3,000,000 people over which he presided in his day have increased to beyond 120,000,000 in our day, living under, and loyal to the same Constitution with the adoption of which he had had most to do, in a convention of which he was the most distinguished member, and over which he had presided with such dignity and finality. He would take no little pride in the fact that during the 143 years of its operation it had been virtually amended but a half dozen times, notwithstanding the world-wide changes—social, industrial, political, and religious—wrought in civilization during that period. Witnessing the stability of the Constitution 143 years after, he would recall with interest the confusion created by some delegates in the Constitutional Convention when it was declared by a member that they labored for posterity as well as for that day; especially he would recall the jeers of certain members of the convention who declared it foolish for any man to hope that any constitution the convention might adopt could last as long as 40 years. In happy contrast to that pessimism, he would view with genuine delight the loyalty to that instrument of 100,000,000 of the best fed, the best clothed, the best equipped, and the happiest people of all history.

To students of political science, and especially as affected by the constitutional history of the United States, a large and perhaps unrecognized part of America's progress must be due to her institutions with which General Washington had to do. The marvelous growth of the Nation's wealth and power, which reveals an annual income as large as the total wealth of the next richest country in all the world, and that country, the mother country, from whom the colonies less than 150 years ago won their independence under the leadership of Washington, would not have been possible in a government in which the talent of a people is restrained, either from the force of custom or legal inhibition. It could only materialize under complete emancipation of the human interest, where universal freedom of growth and development of all the people were not only permitted, by both custom and law, but stimulated by the open door of opportunity to every phase of human progress. Such were the means and the end of wise government.

The establishment of popular government in the United States is the basis of the might and power of America, which in a little over a century of time has forged ahead into world leadership. It is properly regarded by students of history as the major event in the secular history of the world. Its perpetuity for years was questioned by the statesmen of every country, many of whom predicted an early downfall. Its preservation through the storm and stress of gigantic Civil War is pronounced the greatest achievement in the history of civilization. The honor for the founding of the Republic is given to Washington; that for its preservation is given to Lincoln. Both of these events are of major importance, not limited to the people of the United States alone. But the latter, nearer to us in time, and closer in sympathy, as is ever true in family disputes, is apt to remain most vivid in our minds. It sounded the very depths of our national being and touched into new life the chords of passionate devotion to country. Lincoln, the most human as well as humanizing personality, and the central figure in a great national tragedy, which involved the destiny of a system of government, the rising hope of popular control in the world, will never lose his popular hold upon the people. This interest strongly increases with the years, as shown in the number of new books and leading articles published each year. Every new item found, important or insignificant, becomes at once of national interest. His fame increases with the years. On the other hand, Washington being further removed in time as well as being a personality, as it were, set apart from the common run of our population, does not so vividly reach the common heart of America, since in his day America as known to-day did not exist and was yet to be. It may be strange, but nevertheless it is true, that universal participation in the benefits of good government does not only dull our appreciation but is apt to blind us to its sources. There is danger that our people can not fully realize the enormous important contribution of the founder to our national welfare. Waiving his achievement as a general in winning our independence, which was given first rank as a leader in war by the best thought of Europe, I will speak only of his influence as a constructive statesman, a builder, first as President of the Constitutional Convention and later as the first President provided for in the Constitution to launch the new government under that Constitution. By these achievements Washington is given first rank among the world's leaders in the work of nation building.

The age-long struggle in government has been to reach a proper balance between two vitally conflicting theories of government—central authority and local self-government. Both are essential, but the operation of either to the exclusion of the other is fatal. Too great freedom in the latter means anarchy, as displayed in the early history of Greece. Too great authority or power in the former means monarchy, as displayed in the early history of Rome. The failure to find a reconciliation between strong central government in the interest of law and order, on the one hand, and local self-government in the interest of liberty, on the other, was the rock upon which all popular government was at one time or another broken down. The record detailing the conflict between the two forces supplies the major portion of the world's history so far as government is concerned. It is true that some progress toward a solution of this problem was made by our British ancestry, but not until that portion of the Anglo-Saxon peoples who fled the shores of Europe to find a new world undertook the task of the American experiment was there presented a plan of successful solution. It involved the scheme of double sovereignty, an American idea, where the central government was to be sovereign in all matters pertaining to all the States of the federation, and the States to be sovereign in all matters pertaining to distinctly local interests. This consummation was not accidental nor incidental, but the result of a contest of giants in the convention that gave us our organic law. No other item of dispute was more bitterly discussed than the principle of double sovereignty as displayed in the records of the debates of the Constitutional Convention between the advocates of national government and those of federal government. It was fortunate that an aggregation of men unequaled in ability or sagacity, power of reasoning, and wisdom of conclusion, counselled together over these principles of government in building a nation without a model in history or a parallel among men. These men ably attacked this problem of reconciliation between central authority and local government. The best exponent of the first was Hamilton and the best exponent of the latter was Jefferson. Of course it is well understood that Jefferson was not in the convention, but he had an able spokesman in James Madison, who is properly known as "the father of the Constitution." The importance of each of these principles of government depends upon the recognition of the other. Each unrestrained by the other would have been fatal. Too much power would spell monarchy, and too much liberty would end in anarchy.

The one supreme need was a genius with the intellectual acumen to appreciate the value of each principle and with power to compel its recognition. That genius was Washington. No element in his character flashed more brilliantly than his influence over men. From the convention where the plan of double sovereignty was provided for he carried out the principles in the administration of government as the first President by inaugurating the element of power through Hamilton as his leading Cabinet member at the head of the Treasury, and the element of liberty through Jefferson as his first premier at the head of our foreign relations in the State Department. The rivalry so militant in the convention did not end with the adjournment of the convention, but was carried over into administration, and continued as a contest of two theories for the first 70 years of our history, and only ended in a civil war, from which the Nation emerged, preserving the two principles well balanced as understood by Washington. It is now all but universally recognized that our form of government, refined in the heat of debate and purified in the fires of civil war, is the ultimate system of popular government the world over. To-day the Washington system has in some form or other affected every civilized power on the earth. In fact, since the close of the Civil War popular government has covered the earth as the waters cover the sea. The greatest comment on the statesmanship of Washington is the world-wide acceptance of his ideas of popular government. Great as is this contribution to history, it is not at all impossible, but, on the contrary, quite probable, that this prosperous American people, the direct beneficiaries of this system of government, have small appreciation of the debt they owe to Washington. No element in national security is more important than a lively realization of the sources of its power. No feature of perpetuity is more powerful than a sentiment of patriotic devotion to a great cause and loyalty to the leader of that cause. These facts form the basis of a nation-wide celebration of Washington's birth, which should and doubtless will eclipse all preceding celebrations undertaking to do honor to a leader.

Two hundred years after his birth, 133 years after his death, and 143 years after he inaugurated constitutional government is a fitting time to call the people's attention to the debt they owe to the founder of the Republic. Four years ago a commission was created by congressional resolution to provide for a fitting and appropriate celebration of this event. This commission, composed of four Senators appointed by the Vice President, four Members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker, and eight members appointed by the President, with the President of the United States as the president of the commission and the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House as ex officio members, have undertaken to stimulate a popular revival of interest in the founder of the Nation. It has chosen Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, of Harvard, as historian and endeavors to cover the entire Nation in its plans, both for immediate results and permanent memorials. Through the efforts of the historian we have a chain of Washington genealogy running for 16 generations with but one link missing. The commission is securing State cooperation through appointment of State commissions. It is the plan to have each State celebrate the event so that it will become a nation-wide celebration. Through the school authorities it is planned that a program will be put on by every school in the country, if not on the same day at least in the same week. In addition, it is recommended that an especial effort be made by the people in each place visited by Washington dealing with his visit. Every town or county bearing his name should go to extra effort to properly celebrate the event. The commission has been and is keeping a contact with the States on the general plan. The character of these outside celebrations must be left to the local authorities to put on such a celebration as each locality determines. The resourcefulness of our people will insure a varied program. The climax of the event will properly take place in the Capital City which he founded at the beginning of the last century, and which is a concrete object lesson not only of the sagacity of the founder but one of the very best examples of the progress of the Nation which he founded.

The historian has found in England several coats of arms of the Washington family, some of which have been brought to America through the generosity of some American friends who realized their importance. He has prepared a Washington handbook and is now selecting a series of Washington readings to be distributed by the aid of the American Library Association. A Washington map is proposed, which will be distributed largely by the Geographic Association, with its admirable facilities for such service. It has also been recommended that a copy of some acceptable portrait of Washington be supplied to each school in America. The commission is considering the wisdom of marking the important places connected with Washington which may be visited by touring parties.

The subcommittee on program appointed by President Coolidge has not yet outlined the complete plan for the Capital celebration. It is, however, definitely decided against anything of the character of a world's fair. It will lay the emphasis on the historical, spiritual, and patriotic elements of the times. It is recommended that a pageant be given to display in part the progress of the Nation, covering the most prolific period in the march of mankind. The importance of the event will justify the most ambitious demonstration of its character in history. The time necessary for attention to all the features is not yet determined, but it is obvious that it will occupy weeks of demonstrations. If place is given to all agencies suggested soliciting participation, the performances will occupy much time. All the various organizations of national significance, many of which have already expressed a desire to take part, will be given their chance to participate in the celebration. The various departments of the National Government, especially the Army and Navy, both established by Washington, who was the country's first general and who became the first Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, will take prominent part. Aviation, the newest arm of defense, will be given a prominent place on the program of events. The intellectual and literary progress of Washington's country will not be neglected but will be given especial attention.

Estimates of Washington 200 years after his birth will be given not only by the best minds of America, representing every phase of American genius and progress, but also by foreign diplomats, whose countries will be invited to take part in the celebration. Lodges, clubs, and service organizations are planning to take part in special parades and pageants. Labor will be given a prominent place to indicate the wonderful advancement of the American worker and his present high position in the social, financial, and industrial world as compared with labor of other countries. Aside from the pageantry display of progress, 1732–1932, Washington's part in the development of 200 years' progress will be shown on the screen open to all. The agencies in modern progress will be enlisted to properly celebrate the event.

The commission has taken steps for some permanent memorials in commemoration of the founder. Chief among these is the Mount Vernon Memorial Boulevard. Already the construction work has been begun on this memorial, which is to extend from the foot of the Memorial Bridge, at Columbia Island, to Mount Vernon, along the Potomac River, a distance of 15½ miles. This boulevard, which will be 200 feet wide, connecting the famous shrine with the Capital, will pass along a section which lends itself to superior park facilities unequaled in America, if not in the world. The highway department has the counsel and cooperation of the best talent in landscape architecture and art in America. When completed it will be the realization of a dream of the friends of Washington, who have long wished for the time when this shrine would be made accessible to the people of America, who in their adoration will rival in number, in visiting the tomb of Washington, the hordes who annually visit the tomb of the great Napoleon. The construction, which will take at least three years to complete, will be ready for dedication in 1932. The initial cost is four and one-half million dollars. It has been suggested that to each of the thirteen Colonies should be allowed a mile of road for such State tablets and architectural treatment as determined by the State, with the approval of the Federal highway department.

It is a fitting consummation for the Government to connect the two places so closely associated with the life of Washington—the home so conspicuous even at that early time, and the Capital City, whose site he chose, and whose plan was made by the famous L'Enfant of his own choosing. The home stands as he built it, and the city is fast developing on lines recommended by his city planner.

By 1932 the Mall, suggested by L'Enfant's plan, and the Capitol Plaza, a plan recently decided upon, will have progressed far enough to present a continuous boulevard from the railroad depot, intersecting Pennsylvania Avenue between Second and Third Streets NW., then proceeding along the Mall, skirting monumental Government buildings now in process of construction, past the towering shaft of the Washington Monument to that wonderful tribute to the memory of the great war President, the Lincoln Memorial, then across the massive Memorial Bridge, which will be completed before that date and dedicated at that time as a memorial to the North and South, thence over the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway to the shrine of the Republic's founder, a highway which when completed will be unmatched for beauty and historical significance anywhere in the world. The dedication of this highway will be a significant part of the celebration.

The commission will also publish a complete and definitive edition of the writings of George Washington, including his general orders never yet published. Two attempts at publication of his complete writings have been made, both virtually out of print. Neither the Sparks edition of 80 years ago nor the more recent Ford edition of the works of Washington is complete. His general orders as head of the Revolutionary armies, valuable beyond estimate, have never yet been published. There are known now to exist over 1,000 letters of Washington which have never seen print. It is the purpose of the commission to make a complete publication. The value of such a definitive edition of his works and writings can not be overestimated. Their publication will be a permanent contribution to the literature of our country and will serve as a notable memorial to his memory, which the Government alone should carry out, and which in time will be the very best possible source material in the study of America's progress up to date.

The commission has also undertaken to assist in the restoration of Wakefield, the birthplace of Washington. At its last meeting a woman member requested permission to allow the share of the women of America in memorializing the founder to be the restoration of his birthplace. The subcommittee appointed at the last meeting reports progress. Already steps are all but completed by the Wakefield Association to add to the 70 acres now owned by that association 300 more necessary to properly treat the home and its surroundings. This latter addition is made possible by a provisional gift of John D. Rockefeller, jr. The Government will be asked to appropriate $60,000 to complete the restoration. There is no doubt about the final success of this project under the direction of the association aided by the women of the country.

Numerous other proposals are before the commission, some of which are most worthy and appealing, but up to date no other has yet been adopted. It is the belief of all members of the commission that whatever else might be done, the foregoing will be fitting memorials, and nothing less should be undertaken. The commission is seeking the aid of all agencies of public opinion, especially the press, the pulpit, and rostrum, to advance the interest of the public in the celebration. It hopes that the conventions and annual meetings of each national association of whatever character will give place on their programs for such purpose, both in 1930 and 1931. The commission proposes a series of observances beginning with February 22, 1930, with a more elaborate program in 1931, and reaching the climax in the celebration proper in 1932. By that time the country will be Washington-minded, and the Capital City will be a Mecca for a good portion of America's population. This year's nearly 1,000,000 visitors to the city will be but a fraction of those who will come in 1932. More and more our people are showing pride in the growth and beauty of their capital. They wish it not only to be the most beautiful capital in the world, but to be a model in city building, to which States, municipalities, and communities can send representatives for the concrete object lesson of the best in all phases of city and community life.

The capital in 1932, having extended a cordial welcome to the Nation's population, as well as the people of other countries, will grant its hospitality to its greatest influx of visitors, who will be here to join the city to do honor to the memory of the founder of the Republic as well as to view their Capital City, which he laid out, and then to take a drive over the beautiful boulevard to Mount Vernon, and to uncover in silence for a moment in the presence of the mighty dead.

THE NEW CERTER OF GRAVITY OF HUMAN INTEREST—ADDRESS BY DR. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by an eminent scholar, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, entitled "A New Center of Gravity," which relates to the pending tariff legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The address is as follows:

Speaking in this place a year ago, I suggested that one of the deeplying forces now making history in the world is the increasing importance of economic theory and practice when contrasted with that political theory and practice whose interests have dominated the western world through so many centuries. To-night I wish to return to that subject and to offer some considerations and reflections that bear upon it.

The topic which I have in mind to discuss is so abundant in matters which arouse sharp difference of opinion that its presentation from any one point of view is exceedingly difficult. The major fact which I wish to emphasize is that for a generation and more past the center of human interest has been moving from the point which it occupied for some four hundred years to a new point which it bids fair to occupy for a time equally long. Put bluntly, the shift in the position of the center of gravity of human interest has been from politics to economics; from considerations that had to do with forms of government, with the establishment and protection of individual liberty, to considerations that have to do with the production, distribution and consumption of wealth. It is not implied that at any time either of these great groups of considerations has been wanting or has been without enormous influence. What is meant is that the important central and dominating position so long occupied by politics has been taken by economics with results and effects which it is not difficult to discern and, imperfectly at least, to interpret.

Something more than two years ago, speaking in London, I made the statement quite casually that there was not now in the world a single great poet, great philosopher or great religious leader. This expression of personal opinion was soon transformed by the press to read that there was no commanding genius, no leadership, in the world of to-day. Despite the obvious absurdity of this statement, it circulated throughout Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia with great rapidity and with violent reverberations of disagreement, sarcasm, and contempt. As a study in some of the lesser happenings that affect public opinion, this whole occurrence was interesting and, to me at least, amusing. I am prepared to repeat the statement which I made in London in 1927 and again express the opinion that there is to-day in the world no great poet, no great philospher, and no great religious leader. Human interest and the highest types of human capacity have shifted, for the time being at least, to other fields. Goethe died in 1832, Victor Hugo in 1885, Browning in 1889, and Tennyson in 1892. What maker of verse of to-day ranks with them? Hegel, last bearer of the great tradition of Plato and Aristotle, of Thomas Aquinas and Descartes and Kant, died in 1831. Where is his successor? Schleiermacher, who has been given rank by the side of Origen and Calvin, died in 1834, Père Lacordaire, whom Châteaubriand, Victor Hugo, and Montalembert heard with delight and admiration and who was chosen by the French Academy to fill the chair made vacant by the death of De Tocqueville, died in 1861, Cardinal Newman in 1890, and Principal John Caird, most profound among all philosophers of religion who have used the English tongue, in 1898. Who has taken their place? A case may be made for the philosopher Benedetto Croce, born in 1866, and for the poet Rudyard Kipling, born in 1865; but are they not voices crying in the wilderness?

If we go back in memory to the beginning of this modern period in which we live, we can see the intellectual vigor, the intellectual competence, and the intellectual restlessness of the Middle Ages preparing the way for the entrance upon the stage of human events of those intellectual and political interests which for 400 years were to rule the world and to shape its history. At bottom they all had to do with the worth of the individual, with his knowledge, his faith; with his self-expression for achievement, for liberty to live his own life, to shape his own thought, to express his own opinions, and to be the center of his own personal world. The natural result of these impulses and ideals was an enormous outburst of individuality and individual accomplishment. So it came to pass that there were quickly literally stupendous creations and achievements in architecture, in painting and in sculpture, in poetry and in philosophy, in political thought and in political institutions. It would take us too far afield to go at any length into all that transpired during the next 400 years, but the story in its outlines at least ought to be familiar to educated men and women.

Political institutions lagged behind in their adaptation by these new influences to these new ideals. The fine arts, poetry, literature, philosophy, and religious fervor were all well under way before zeal for individual liberty in social and public life had unloosed itself from the wrappings which traditional class and personal despotism had wound about it. Now and then an organ voice was heard in prose or in poetry which sounded the note of true progress in politics. Of these organ voices, that of John Milton was the chief and most powerful, and it was Voltaire who carried this new message to France in his "Lettres sur les Anglais." The end came through revolution, and in each case the revolution was fomented, stimulated, and guided by literature. The first steps were taken in England and were in complete harmony with the teachings and arguments of Milton. A century later came the quickly following revolutions in the United States and in France; then the proclamation of independence by the Latin-American peoples of South America, and finally the great revolutionary movement of 1848 on the continent of Europe which produced effects that were far greater and far more lasting than the casual observer would imagine.

When modern man had attained this goal and had established those institutions of his own making which he believed consonant with civil liberty and the protection of it, he was not satisfied. Perhaps he had overlooked the fact that no institutions, however admirable, will work themselves, and that human nature remains human nature with its intellectual and moral limitations, with its emotional heaves and outbursts, with its selfishness and fanaticisms, whether it finds itself citizen of a republic or subject of a despot or owing allegiance and service to a feudal lord. Obviously then, the task before mankind was to perfect these new-made political and social institutions of his and better to adapt himself to them and them to him.

In substance and in roughest outline this seems to me the story of the fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and part at least of the nineteenth centuries. The center of gravity of human interest for all that long period was to be found at the point where this intellectual and political interest manifested itself. What change has there been, and what has caused that change?

The lines of division between the various periods into which we put human history are not sharp-cut, clearly defined and mechanical. On the contrary they are often difficult to place and still more difficult to explain. Somewhere about the end of the eighteenth century, and more rapidly during the first half of the nineteenth, man's knowledge of natural forces and his power over them had so greatly increased that there was brought about a profound modification, not only of his daily life and occupation but of his interests both dominant and unconscious. If one must find a date for the new period in which conscious economic interest began to be dominant, he could plausibly find it in the year 1776. In that year Adam Smith published his epoch-marking Wealth of Nations and Turgot retired from the service of the French King, having written 10 years earlier his truly great work entitled "Réflection sur la Formation et la Distribution des Richesses." One must go back to the inexhaustible Aristotle to find any analysis of the economic life and the economic motive which has anything like equal importance to these. Friedrich List's remarkable work, entitled "Das Nationale System der Politischen Oekonomie," followed in 1841. It may be coincidence or it may be something deeper than that which brought the so-called industrial revolution into existence while these literally great works were still young. Modern chemistry had begun its existence. Physical science rapidly took on new, more profound, and more far-reaching forms of knowledge and its applications. Arkwright and Watt, Crompton and Stephenson, became names to conjure with. Machinery displaced the human hand and the factory pushed to one side the industry of the home. The tide of human interests and human opportunity began to flow cityward almost as a matter of course, and the outlook on life of millions upon millions of human beings was radically changed as were their environment and their hourly occupation. For a time communication lagged behind the needs of the new order, but quickly the steam engine and the electric current, with their miraculously rapid improvements and achievements, came to make Puck's girdle not a poet's fancy but a matter of daily and familiar fact. When the air is made a highroad and the human voice finds the ocean no obstacle, we are living in a wholly new world whether we realize it or not.

Each day it becomes more obvious that with all these changes economic interest has consciously displaced activity which is directly political or chiefly intellectual, and the record may be read on every hand. To be sure, politics is always bound up with economics, as economics has always been bound up more or less closely with politics, but it is clear that in our time the economic motive and not the political interest increasingly controls the life and thought of the world.

It would be rash, indeed, to attempt to forecast what the historian of centuries hence will have to say of us, but one likes to hazard the guess that the awful years, 1914 to 1918, marked the definitive end of an era and cleared the way for something other than had been before. It is for human beings themselves, and not for mere chance, to decide whether that something other will be better or worse than that which it has displaced.

When life was simple it may well have been that men saw what was going on about them sub specie æternitatis, to use Spinoza's phrase, but if so, that time has long gone by. We might speculate hours without end on what future generations will say of us and what value they will attach to those things which seem to us of such mighty importance, but to do so would be no more practical than to try to answer the question what would be thought by King Herod, by Pontius Pilate, or by the Apostle Paul of the writings of Thomas à Kempis, David Friedrich Strauss, or Ernest Renan. It may well be that we ourselves cannot see the wood for the trees, but if so, the limitation is one which we can not surmount or overcome. We must be content to do the best we can to understand our times and their problems and to deal with them as becomes men and women of intelligence and of character.

Obviously the certain and revolutionary result of the shift which has taken place in the center of gravity of human interest is to put wealth in the position which liberty used to occupy. This displacement more than anything else explains the extraordinary decline of political liberalism which has taken place in both Europe and the United States. "It bores me to hear you discuss liberty," said a young Oxford man, who is now a member of the House of Commons. He was perfectly sincere and he spoke the language of his generation. For him at least, and for millions like-minded with him, the center of gravity of human interest had definitely moved from the politics of principle to the politics of interest, from problems of liberty to problems of wealth.

A stupendous amount of nonsense has been written about the economic interpretation of history. Of course, the gain-seeking motive has never been absent from human life and human society, but time and again and for long periods of time it has been so far in the background as to be without measurable influence on the course of events. Moreover, when the gain-seeking motive is confronted by an alternative based on character, on high principle, on large intelligence, as it so frequently is in the life history of men and women, it often goes to the wall. It is within the range of possibility that the whole history of an ant hill might be given an economic interpretation and none other, but human society does not yield itself quite so easily or so quickly to the doctrinaire.

The present eclipse of liberalism is so plain that he who runs may see. In part this eclipse may be due to the fact that what were once distinctive liberal principles have now been either accepted or assimilated by groups and by parties which do not proclaim themselves liberal. In still larger part, however, this eclipse is due to that change in the center of gravity from liberty to wealth, which has already been described. The enormous influence of this dominant motive on all human conduct and on all public policies is plain. It controls an increasing number of individual lives and it is shaping most powerfully the policies of nations both new and old, for the production and distribution of wealth is distinctly a collective or group act rather than an expression and revelation of individuality, as is the case in letters, the fine arts, or philosophy. In the field of scientific research, individual achievements of the highest order fortunately remain.

The economic interest is now bound up closely, although we must hope not permanently or even for any considerable time, with that extreme form of nationalism which brought on the Great War and which was sent to its destruction by and through that war. If narrow nationalism, built on a truly political foundation, could not do better than it did, what can possibly be expected of a narrow nationalism that is built on an economic foundation? The world is just now standing at a crossroads. It may take the path in one direction and so make agriculture, industry, commerce, trade, finance the fortunate means of uniting the whole world, of increasing its prosperity, and of buttressing its peace, or it can take the opposite path and so turn the nations into narrow-minded, unsympathetic, jealous, and quarreling neighbors and prepare the way for another cataclysm which, if it should come, would mark civilization's end.

What are we going to do about it? Where shall our influence be thrown? Shall it be for a repetition of the old stupidities, the old ignorances, and the old antagonisms, or shall it be for a new world order in which selfish competition shall be supplanted by kindly and large-minded cooperation? That is in substance the crucial question which at this moment awaits answer by leaders of opinion in every land.

It so happens that passing events in our own country offer excellent illustration of the alternative which is before the world. Our National Legislature is at the moment engaged in framing new tariff legislation. Those who are familiar even in cursory fashion with the political history of the United States know how important this is and to what results it may lead. They will recall the debates which accompanied the establishment of the so-called American system in 1816, and those which accompanied the enactment of what was described as the tariff of abominations in 1828. They will recall the legislation of 1846 and that of 1861. They will not overlook the readjustments and vigorous controversies which marked the 20 years following the close of the Civil War. The McKinley tariff, the Wilson tariff, and the four important tariff revisions of the past quarter century are all reasonably familiar. The political disasters which followed the legislation of 1890 and that of 1910 must still be fresh in the public mind and not without their lessons for the legislators of to-day.

It is perfectly possible for Congress in enacting new tariff legislation to advance or to set back the prosperity and the peace of the world. The time has long since gone by when tariff legislation is purely a domestic matter. For the United States, as for Great Britain, for France, for Germany, for Italy, and indeed for almost every land, tariff legislation is primarily international in its incidence and in its more lasting results. Plainly the time has not come nor is it in sight when Richard Cobden's ideal of absolute freedom of international trade is possible, even if practicable. The differences of level between the industrial systems of various nations are still too great to permit entire freedom of trade without overturning much that we should all like to keep secure. On the other hand, the goal of any tariff system should be, as Garfield long ago declared it to be, an increasing freedom of trade and international intercourse. In other words, tariffs established for purposes other than revenue are not ends in themselves, but means to ends. When those ends are achieved, the means toward them may be dispensed with. Alexander Hamilton, whose report on manufactures submitted to the House of Representatives in 1791, is the basis and beginning of the whole protective-tariff policy so far as the United States is concerned, pointed out seven ends to be gained by the establishment under tariff protection of manufacturing industries in the new nation. These were: Division of labor, more extensive use of machinery, larger employment of those classes in the community not ordinarily engaged in business, promotion of immigration, greater scope for the diversity of talents which exist among men, the provision of a more ample and varied field for enterprise and the creation of new, more certain, and more steady demand for the surplus products of the soil. After 140 years it is not possible to improve upon this analysis of Hamilton's.

It may be used to-day as it was used then, both to instruct the public mind and to frame governmental policy. Hamilton, Clay, Lincoln, Blaine, Garfield, and McKinley in his last speech of interpretation and prophecy at Buffalo, all represented and taught this doctrine and this point of view. They were not concerned with assisting individuals, groups, or sections to profit or to prosper at the expense of the general public interest. It was that general public interest which they had always in mind, and it was that general public interest which they made the test of their practical and specific recommendations for legislation.

During the past century, the conditions which confronted Hamilton and Clay have completely changed. The people of the United States have become enormous exporters of manufactured and partially manufactured articles. They have become the greatest creditor nation that the world has ever seen. So far from being isolated and apart, in all that relates to commerce, industry, finance, travel, and the intellectual life, they have become more closely intertwined with the life and the history of other nations throughout the world than any other people has ever been, not excepting ancient Rome or Great Britain for the half-century after the Napoleonic wars. These changed conditions mean that American tariff legislation, if framed on high principle and in accordance with established American doctrine, must be framed in a spirit quite different from that which prevailed when these economic, financial, and international relationships did not exist, or were only at their beginnings. It may well be that according as the Congress of the United States now in session acts wisely or unwisely on this crucial question, the peace and prosperity of the world, including, of course, that of our own people, will be mightily advanced or gravely compromised. The hour has struck for constructive, far-seeing statesmanship. This is no time to listen to the selfish pleas of paid lobbyists or to permit log-rolling combinations of special interests to use public authority for their own benefit in disregard of the far greater interest of the whole people of the United States. In short, a tariff formulated in the year 1929 with an eye single to the public interest and in accordance with the historic principles of American fiscal policy would be something very different from that now reported in the public press as likely to be urged for enactment into law.

The economic and financial relationships of smaller nations than ours are bringing forward novel and startling problems and asking for them a quick solution. The political and economic history of the United States would have been very different had the country's area and homogeneity of climate been those of Great Britain or France or Italy. The great success of the American fiscal policy has been due primarily to the vast extent of territory, the great diversity of climate and the almost limitless variety of products found within an area where absolute freedom of trade exists by provision of the Constitution of the United States.

The very striking tariff map of continental Europe, which Sir Clive Morrison-Bell has caused to be prepared and exhibited in various capitals as well as at Geneva, shows with startling vividness how impossible is any long continuance of the existing economic situation on the Continent of Europe. Where a nation's territory is relatively restricted, with climate and products that are in large measure homogeneous, there must be an increasing measure of free and unrestricted international trade if the people of that country are to prosper and to satisfy their growing wants. What was once the dream of a United States of Europe is on its rapid way to become a reality. This new international organization is, of course, not likely to resemble in political essentials the federated Republic which is the United States of America, or the federated Republic which is the new German state, but it is quite likely to come into existence as a new economic administrative unity, with an increasing measure of free and unrestricted trade between its component parts. The fact that the three leading statesmen of continental Europe in our day—M. Briand, Doctor Stresemann, and

M. Benes—are all studying this question sympathetically, with a view to its positive and early solution, is a measure of its high practical character at the present time.

No mistake could be graver than to suppose that this new economic union, should it come into existence, will be aimed in unfriendly fashion at the United States. When it comes into existence, it will come in response to a European need and for a European purpose. It would have to come if the United States of America did not exist, and it would have to come because these many separate nations can not exist and prosper under modern economic and social conditions without the very largest measure of cooperation. It is to this new economic union that many of us look for ways and means of ameliorating the condition of minorities in some of these lands, as well as for ways and means of overcoming some of the antagonisms and friction that have grown out of boundary disputes in recent years. Given a coherent, reasonable, and well-administered economic union, there would appear to be no reason why the same conditions of high wages, mass production, cheap and quick communication, and installment buying which prevail throughout that free-trade area which is the United States should not quickly come to prevail throughout another free-trade area which would be the economic union of the United States of Europe.

From both these great economic unities the British Commonwealth of Nations stands apart, and it is that fact and its implications and possibilities which are likely to govern and direct British policy, domestic and foreign, for a generation to come. An alternative before the British Commonwealth of Nations would appear to be either to join the economic union which will be the United States of Europe, or to institute a new and third economic union, world-wide in its scope and magnificent in its proportions, on the foundation of the British Commonwealth of Nations itself. Of the two, the latter seems at the moment the course more likely to be pursued. Perhaps it would be speedily entered upon were it not for the difficult question as to how to bring this new economic union about without taxing the food of the British people themselves. If to the United States of America there were added two additional economic unions, the United States of Europe and the British Commonwealth of Nations, each protecting a huge and widely diversified area over which absolute free trade would prevail, Cobden's ideal would have come near to accomplishment, although in a form which he himself could hardly have forecast. It would seem likely that should these three great economic unions come into existence side by side, the pressure of self-interest would lead them steadily to lower their tariff barriers rather than to raise them.

We have learned much during the past generation about the practical economic life of civilized peoples and about the ways and means by which human satisfaction and human prosperity may be advanced through political means. When the vitally important Sherman Act was passed in 1890, it was overlooked for a decade and then set vigorously to work to check those growing combinations in the fields of industry and transportation which were regarded as inimical to the public interest. We now see that this policy, however well intended, was not in the public interest, but quite the contrary. It is now demonstrated to be in the public interest that these formerly prohibited combinations should be allowed and encouraged, but that when encouraged they should be publicly supervised and controlled. It is by these very combinations that overhead costs have been reduced, increased returns to labor made possible, mass production developed, and quick and cheap transportation and communication not only brought into existence but made profitable. We have learned that it is not so important to have low cost of production, particularly if that means insufficient wages and poor equipment, as it is to have an increasingly large body of contented and satisfied consumers who will constantly make new markets for the multiplying products which invention and ingenuity so constantly suggest to industry.

It is plain that all these problems and considerations are the accompaniment of that change of the center of gravity of which I am primarily speaking. If men were still chiefly concerned with the form of political institutions, with representative government, with the protection of civil liberty, with poetry, philosophy, and the religious life, then the most significant and striking individuals would be leaders of the people, poets, philosophers, and religious teachers. The fact that they are not is a measure and an index of the change which has taken place.

What is to be the end of it all? Surely it would be a sorry day for the world if zeal for liberty, if poetry, philosophy, and religion were permanently to remain in the background and were to cease to hold their once dominant place in the life and the minds of men. It would be a long step backward if through the substitution of wealth for liberty men were to become permanently materially minded and gradually to slip back into the state of industrious and contented ants. A way must be found to correlate this new economic motive and ideal with the older intellectual, political, and religious motives and ideals, and to enrich each by the other. That this is no easy task goes without saying. First of all, men must be made conscious of the contradictions that have come into their lives through failure to realize that this center of gravity has shifted. Americans of the office-holding and office-seeking class continue to-day to quote Jefferson and to roll up their eyes and sob at the name of Lincoln, while flatly contradicting in thought, in feeling, and in act the most precise, the most fundamental, and the most far-reaching teachings of these great leaders of men. The same is true in Great Britain. Many a man calls himself a Liberal to-day who by his influence and his vote is acting quite contrary to the example and the teachings of Gladstone and of Campbell-Bannerman.

Everything would seem to depend upon our capacity really to know what is going on. This means the acquisition and the use of the power to think. It means the acquisition and use of the power to discriminate between rumor and fact, between hope and accomplishment. It means the possession of a body of principles of life, of thought, and of conduct that will offer both a base line from which to measure and a corner stone on which to build in approaching the understanding and interpretation of these new phenomena in the world. It is my own belief that there is no necessary opposition between these two centers of gravity. I think it can be shown that as liberty as a chief interest and ideal was the natural outgrowth of circumstances and happenings that preceded it, so wealth can be shown to be related to the zeal for liberty. We must not let them quarrel and set up opposition one to the other. We must not let them, either singly or in combination, dominate the lives of men and nations for the production once more of narrow, selfish, unsympathetic nationalism. We must bend every energy to make both defense of liberty and the production and just distribution of wealth a means of building the moral fiber of individuals and of nations, and of bringing the peoples of the earth into increasingly close friendship, interdependence, understanding, and cooperation for high purpose.

The ancient world is still, after all the centuries, our greatest teacher. The best textbook for the statesman of to-day and to-morrow is Cicero's famous essay De Officiis, his treatise on moral duties. Cicero understood and taught the doctrine, profoundly true, that the honorable state, like the honorable man, will refuse to take advantage of a neighbor in order to become either powerful or rich.

LINCOLN MONUMENT UNVEILING AT FREEPORT, ILL.—ADDRESS BY THE HON GEORGE W. NORRIS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on August 27, 1929, there was unveiled at Freeport, Ill., a statue of Abraham Lincoln, by Leonard Crunelle. The statue was presented to the city of Freeport by the Hon. W. T. Rawleigh. The statue stands on the historic spot where the second of the great Lincoln-Douglas debates took place. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the principal address, delivered by the Hon. GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, on the occasion of the unveiling of that statue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. Senator NORRIS's address is as follows:

We are assembled in this historic spot to pay a grateful nation's homage and respect to the greatest statesman of modern times. Everywhere in civilization the name of Abraham Lincoln is emblematic of human freedom. Under his leadership the cruel shackles of human bondage were stricken from the bleeding limbs of a subjugated race. History has enshrined his name as the great leader who put civilization's stamp of disapproval upon the centuries-old claim that it was right in the sight of God and man for the flesh and blood of human beings to be the subject of barter and sale in the commercial transactions of men.

When our Revolutionary fathers rebelled from the mother country and formed this Nation they were performing the greatest governmental experiment ever undertaken in the history of the world. In order to reach any conclusion in the establishment of the new Government it was necessary that great compromises should be made. While the government formed under these circumstances was far in advance of anything which had theretofore existed and was the greatest step in human progress ever taken in the history of the world, yet some of the elements of tyranny and oppression still remained, unsettled and unsolved.

Of these evils, the Constitution recognized and protected the canker-demon, slavery, with its outstretched hands grasping at the very vitals of the Nation and sapping therefrom the lifeblood of the Union. It was reserved for the heroes of a later day to drive this cruel monster from our shores and to give to the people a government free from the contaminating influence of this—the greatest evil that ever disgraced a nation's history.

It is said that in ancient times a certain king undertook to erect a monument which should be an emblem of his greatness upon the field of battle. Out of solid marble, in the image of the king, the statue was carved, and it remained only to raise it to its solid foundation. He set aside a certain day as a legal holiday for the erection of the monument and invited all his subjects to be present and witness the spectacle. When the day arrived, thousands of his people from all parts of his kingdom came together at the appointed place to assist in placing the statue upon its foundation. Ropes were fastened and seized by hundreds of willing hands. When the great monument in the likeness of the king was raised from off the earth and was suspended beneath the heavens, it was discovered that the dry and unused ropes were giving way. In this exciting moment, what was to be done? It was now impossible to let the monument back and to pull farther would break the ropes and the statue would be broken and ruined in its fall. The breathless silence was at last broken by a clear, sweet voice which rang out upon the air with the exclamation, "Wet the ropes!" Immediately water was brought, the ropes were moistened, and the mighty statue was raised to its position, uninjured and unharmed.

The people of this country decided to erect a monument as emblematic of liberty. It was to stand upon the grave of state sovereignty, dedicated to human freedom. For years some of our leading citizens had been educating public sentiment and molding it into proper shape. In 1861 the sculptor's work was finished and it remained only to place the monument upon its foundation. When it was partially raised and was suspended between heaven and earth, the startling discovery was made that the ropes were breaking. In this emergency, when wise men hesitated, when leaders faltered, when politicians stumbled, when patriotic women prayed for divine help, there was one clear voice which rang out upon the air with the command, "Wet the ropes!" It was the voice of the immortal Lincoln which reverberated from lake to river and from ocean to ocean; and, in answer to his call there came from the workshops of New England and from the farms of the West a million brave and patriotic men who, with their own loyal blood, wet the ropes. Again that voice was heard, and with one united, patriotic effort, the monument was placed upon its solid foundation where we believe it is to remain as long as human liberty is held sacred, as long as human love is divine.

The progress of civilization is always slow. Its history is a continuous contest between those who would give greater power of government into the hands of the people and those who are opposed to change. It is human nature that men endowed with power will struggle to the utmost before surrendering any of it. The natural thing for those having power over their fellows is to stretch their authority to the limit and to reach out with greedy hands for more and more power over the control of their fellow beings.

Originally, in the days of barbarism, the king was supreme. His subjects were slaves. He had the right to take the life of anyone without being held accountable for the act. As the people became better educated and more intelligent they resented the tyranny of unjust rulers and struggled to take into their own hands more of the power of government. This has brought about a continuous contest between those intrusted with power, seeking to retain it, and those who were suffering from tyranny, trying to take the power away from unjust rulers and place it in the hands of the people themselves. Some of these contests have been fought out upon the field of battle. Some, more recently, have been settled by a peaceful means. The history of the overthrow of slavery is a glaring instance of one of the greatest steps ever taken in human progress. It may be greater than any other one, but it is emblematic and illustrative of them all.

In the present stage of civilized society it is difficult to see how anyone could ever defend, anywhere, at any time, this unjust and cruel system of holding human being in bondage. We wonder now how any one human could have ever tolerated or defended such iniquitous, barbarous practice, and yet the sacrifices made to rid the world of this demon are far beyond the scope of human imagination to fully comprehend. For every drop of blood drawn by slavery's lash there has been sacrificed the lives of thousands of innocent men who died upon the field of battle.

It is difficult to understand sometimes why nature demands such terrible sacrifices to right human wrongs. A great poet has said:

> "How truly the course of nature tells,
> By its small heed to earthly suffering,
> That it was fashioned for a happier world."

But such is the law, which, with immutable force, has always governed the progress of civilization.

In every great struggle, after victory has been attained and a step in progress has been made, it is found that special interests have taken advantage of conditions for their own selfish enrichment, and, while the main object has been accomplished, many new evils have crept into the governmental fabric.

The incentive for such things is the almost natural desire for special enrichment. In fact it is historically true to say that most of the wars of history have been brought on, either directly or indirectly, by the desire of some powerful special class or classes to enrich themselves at the sacrifice and disadvantage of their fellow men. If there had been no financial profit in the ownership of human flesh and blood, there would have been no slavery. If there had been no slavery, the Civil War never would have been part of our history.

The rivalry of nations, controlled by men desirous of making money through trade and commerce, has resulted in the establishment of huge armies and in an international race for larger navies. If we could take the profit out of war, we would have taken the greatest possible step toward international peace. If there were no profit in preparing for war, this universal, international armament race would be unknown.

We have recently passed through a World War, the greatest in all history—a war which, we were made to believe, was fought to forever end war, and yet 10 years after its close we find the nations of the world, our Nation among the rest, spending more money in preparation for war than ever before. Our Government is now spending annually more money in preparing for future wars than was ever spent in any 20 years of peace before the World War.

The nations of the world have recently signed a universal treaty outlawing war and agreeing never, in the future, to resort to war for the settlement of any international dispute; and yet, in the face of this agreement, we are recklessly going forward, during times of profound peace, spending more money annually for a larger army and a greater navy, which, we foolishly say, is done as an insurance of peace. The aim, it is claimed, is to build a navy and establish an army so great, so powerful, that no other nation, through fear alone, would think of fighting us. This means that we desire to maintain peace by frightening other nations in regard to our preparedness and our strength. The fallacy of this doctrine is that this great race is participated in by all the other nations and that every other great nation is doing the same as we are doing.

One of the causes of war, and the greatest cause of the great World War, was this universal preparation for war. Each nation seemed impelled to outstrip every other nation, all the time professing peaceful intentions. History shows that continual preparation for war will bring on war. If the world continues to arm itself, no matter what its proclamations for peace may be, the inevitable war will follow.

A great nation ought to set an example to the world, and, in order to make it possible to make such an example effective, it ought to announce that even in the preparation for war there shall be no private profit, gain, or enrichment; that the weapons of human destruction, if they must be made, will be prepared by the Government; that naval vessels will be built in Government naval yards; and that private corporations and private monopoly shall have no opportunity to be enriched by the expenditure of these vast sums of money. If our Nation took this stand, the universal propaganda for a larger army and a bigger navy would disappear. If the civilized world once knew that America was taking such a step, this universal race for military supremacy would vanish as the dew fades before the morning sun.

But the greed of monopoly is not confined to war, and the profit which monopoly makes out of war is in turn used to control government in times of peace. This was well understood by the immortal Lincoln and he many times expressed his fear that the immense wealth of individuals and corporations accruing from war would be used in time of peace to oppress the people.

In the days of Washington millionaires were unknown, and even in the days of Lincoln combinations and monopoly had not publicly shown their power and their influence. But one of the great evils which always springs from war is the enrichment of individuals and corporations which profit by war. You can not harvest a crop of millionaires without making an army of paupers.

Wealth, when combined in immense quantities, is always a stumbling block in the advancement of civilization. Combinations and trusts formed for profit bring in their wake a new kind of slavery. Under the leadership of Abraham Lincoln we abolished human slavery, but since that day there has grown up in our country powerful combinations and monopolies which were unheard of then. There never was a time in the history of our country when combined wealth possessed the power over government which it possesses to-day. Economic slavery is the ultimate result of complete combination of money, and economic slavery is as cruel, as merciless, and as effective as slavery based upon the color of the human skin.

When combinations of wealth control our politics and our political parties, the common people are forgotten and the power of wealth looks only to the happiness, contentment, and enrichment of those in control. When monopoly controls the policies of our great political parties the evil which Lincoln feared shows itself along other lines and in other ways. It eventually controls government in all its branches. It names the appointees for thousands of our important offices. It controls the sources of information and the political machinery which governs elections.

The man who is compelled to toil against his wish and contrary to his will is a slave, even though his skin may be white. We have seen, in recent years, Federal judges who were appointed in most cases through the mighty influence of wealth to positions of unlimited power, for life, issuing injunctions in labor disputes, which, in effect, have brought about involuntary servitude. These injunctions have denied access to the courts. They have denied to toiling masses the rights which are essential to human freedom. The tyranny of some of these injunctions, in their effect, reminds us of the days when slavery was recognized by our Constitution.

We did not hesitate, when the time came, to change the Constitution so as to abolish slavery based upon the color of the individual; and the time will soon come when we must, by constitutional enactment, take away the life tenure of office of men appointed to the judiciary through the influence of partisan political machines.

The spirit of Lincoln still lives, and it is sufficient to lead the people to change our fundamental law so as to abolish any form of involuntary servitude regardless of the conditions upon which it is based. Not only will an enlightened and civilized people demand that all forms of slavery shall be abolished, but they will likewise demand that every citizen's voice shall be heard in the selection of a Chief Magistrate and that political machines and selfish combinations of wealth shall be dethroned in their unlimited power which our political practices have given them in the selection of our President.

When our forefathers framed the Constitution they were engaged, as I have said, in a governmental experiment. They were taking away from the king some of his power and giving it to the people, and yet they hesitated as to how far they should go. Therefore, they provided that the President should be elected by an Electoral College. It was intended that the presidential electors should exercise a discretion in the selection of a Chief Magistrate, but, from long practice, step by step, political machines have gained control and adopted methods in the selection of the President which deprive the ordinary citizen of any participation in that—the most important step of our Government.

The Electoral College provided for in the Constitution stands in the way of complete enjoyment of freedom by the electorate. It is a useless, unnecessary, and hampering step in giving to the people the freedom which our forefathers intended they should have and the freedom which Lincoln in his day struggled to attain.

The abolishment of the Electoral College by a proper amendment to the Constitution of the United States, giving to the electors the freedom of the ballot, is a necessary step which must and will be taken when the people realize that it stands between them and complete freedom of citizenship.

The ordinary citizen has nothing to say as to who shall be President. The national conventions, as everyone knows, are controlled by political combinations and partisan, political machinery. Special interests, able to supply money for the sinews of a political campaign, are dominant, and such a thing as electing an independent candidate for President under our political system is possible only in theory but absolutely impossible in practice.

The control of our Government by special interests is the glaring obstacle standing in the way of a government "of the people, by the people, for the people." In fact, if Lincoln were alive to-day and engaged in a national contest he would be denounced as a Bolshevist for uttering these memorable words, words which express the foundation principle of every democracy. Monopoly would agree with Lincoln on one of these propositions but would disagree with him on the other two. It would say with Lincoln, "Government of the people," but at that point it would part company. It would have a government of the people, by monopoly, for monopoly.

Under a recent decision of our own Supreme Court, if the lowly Nazarene should return to earth, come to our shores, and make application for citizenship he would be denied on account of the doctrines of peace and righteousness which he advocated and for which he suffered death upon the cross.

These are evils of which it is not pleasant to complain, but there is no time more appropriate to call attention to them than when speaking of the virtues and the doctrines of the immortal Lincoln—the man whose heart and soul breathed the freedom and the welfare of humanity, the man who stood for righteousness, for the poor as well as the rich, and who, if he were here in body, as I hope he is in spirit, would be the leader to free men and women of his color as he was the leader in freeing men and women of a different color.

The power and influence of monopoly in the control of our political and economic system has been recently very effectively shown by the investigation made by the Federal Trade Commission of the activities of the so-called Power Trust. The disclosures in this investigation have shocked the moral sensibilities of the Nation. The evidence produced demonstrates that the Power Trust is the greatest monopoly which has ever been put together by human ingenuity. With its sinister and selfish motives it has invaded the public schools. It has contaminated the colleges by indirectly bribing our professors. It has controlled the legislatures of our States. It has attempted to buy seats in the United States Senate. It has approached the minister in the pulpit. It has browbeaten, purchased, and contaminated the public press. It has not forgotten various social and economic organizations. It has sent its emissaries into women's clubs and into boy-scout organizations. It has controlled secret, economic, political, and religious societies. It has undertaken to control the election of judges, and has spent millions of money in its various attempts to control political organizations and elections from road overseer to President. It has spent millions of dollars to build up a public sentiment favorable to its ideas on the ownership and control of public utilities. It has done all these things by secret, underhanded, dishonorable, and unpatriotic methods. It was sufficiently powerful to prevent both of the great dominant political parties of the Nation from putting into their platforms any word of condemnation. Its emissaries have secretly overrun the country in its attempts to control all the activities of man, with the ultimate object of finally owning and controlling the generation and distribution of electric current over the entire United States. It has not hesitated to participate in elections and to blacken the character and question the patriotism of every candidate or citizen and every organization that has dared to interfere with its program. Its ultimate aim is complete ownership and distribution of electric power.

We are living in the dawn of an electric age. Electricity is becoming as common and as necessary in our homes as water. Every rippling stream which trickles down the mountainside and flows through the meadows to the sea is capable of producing this unseen and but little understood element which man has called "electricity." This unseen but powerful element is fast becoming a necessary part of our civilization. It is necessary in the control and the management of all manufacturing establishments. It can turn the tireless wheels of industry in the greatest factory, and with equal accuracy and precision it can perform various and numberless household duties in the humblest homes. It relieves the drudgery of the housewife. It performs the work of the laborer, the miner, the manufacturer, and all other branches of industry.

If this necessity of human life is to be owned and controlled by monopoly, then the people will ultimately become the economic slaves of the owners of this modern necessity. In the main, it is developed from our natural resources. The streams which God fills with the rains and the snows from the mountain sides, the coal placed by an all-wise Creator in the bowels of the earth were intended for the comfort and the happiness of man, but this great monopoly is converting them into a private asset for private gain.

A people who, under Lincoln, would not stand for the enslaving of the black race, will not permanently submit to the control and domination of a necessity of life by a private corporation for private gain. This great necessity of our existence, a part of the very sinews of our life and our civilization, must be taken to the factories and to the homes of our people without being loaded down with monopolistic costs and profits. The act of an all-wise Creator in giving this blessing to mankind must not be perverted and used for the subjugation and overburdening of the people.

What doth it profit if we strike the chains of slavery from the black man and then permit monopoly to forge the same chains upon millions of our own race?

I make no complaint against wealth as such. I have no condemnation against the man who honestly acquires a vast fortune. It is the misuse of wealth that deserves our condemnation, and when these vast fortunes are combined and recombined in the forms of trusts and monopolies, and when they undertake to control for their own private gain all the natural resources of the country, then it is time for a free people, if they would retain their freedom, to rise up in defense of their God-given rights. Economic slavery is as great an injustice, as cruel, as any political slavery ever established by man; and if, by the combination of vast amounts of wealth, the economic, the political, and the social functions of our race are controlled and dominated by those who own the combination, then those who are thus controlled are in reality slaves. When monopoly gets control of a necessity of life, especially when the necessity is derived from a natural resource which God has given to us all, then we are on the verge of an economic slavery which will crush to earth those who work and those who toil.

Lincoln was not unaware of the dangers which monopoly would bring. He knew that one of the evil results of war was the amassing of immense fortunes and the building up of huge combinations of capital. He was a believer in the permanence of the Declaration of Independence, and he believed that that immortal document applied not only to Revolutionary days and to political tyranny, but that its declarations were equally aimed at monopolistic control at all times. He had great reverence for Jefferson, because Jefferson had put into the declaration permanent assurance underlying a free government which, as Lincoln said, applied then as well as it applied in the days of the Revolution. In referring to these dangers and to the change of political leaders and political parties after they had gained office and power, he said:

"These expressions, differing in form, are identical in object and effect—the supplanting the principles of free government and restoring those of classification, caste, and legitimacy. They would delight a convocation of crowned heads plotting against the people. They are the vanguard, the sappers and miners, of returning despotism. We must repulse them, or they will subjugate us.

"This is a world of compensations, and he who would be no slave must consent to have no slave. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God can not long retain it.

"All honor to Jefferson, to the man who in the concrete pressure of a struggle for national independence by a single people had the coolness, forecast, and capacity to introduce into a merely revolutionary document an abstract truth, applicable to all men and all times, and so to embalm it there, that to-day and in all coming days it shall be a rebuke and a stumbling block to the harbingers of reappearing tyranny and oppression."

Again, in a message to Congress, Lincoln said:

"Labor is the superior of capital and deserves much the higher consideration. * * * Let them beware of surrendering a political power which they already possess, and which, if surrendered, will surely be used to close the door of advancement against such as they, and to fix new disabilities and burdens upon them, till all of liberty shall be lost."

That part of the Declaration of Independence which Lincoln seemed to love most and for which he gave particular praise to Jefferson was the part which, in his judgment, applied to our present day as well as to the days of the Revolution. It was the part which he denominated as the very origin of popular government. It reads as follows:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

These words were the foundation corner stone of Lincoln's philosophy. Boiled down they include just three things—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. These are the objects—the only objects of government. They are as permanent as the heavens, and it was an interference with these rights that Lincoln even in his day feared might be brought about by monopoly and combinations of wealth. Since that day we have seen monopolies grow, until, like a colossus, they now tower toward Heaven's canopy to such an extent that the danger which Lincoln feared then confronts us now. This danger is growing greater and getting nearer. I have no fear but that the patriotic people of the Nation will meet it as they have met every other danger which has ever confronted our Government.

From the days of Lincoln many of our great leaders and political economists have pointed out this danger, and it has been suggested by them that the danger to our Government and our social fabric which comes from the amassing of such huge fortunes could be at least partially met by the enactment of a Federal progressive inheritance tax. But every effort to enact such a tax, which would curtail the evils of unreasonable wealth, has been strenuously fought by the same combinations and monopolies which have been growing in power and influence since the days of Lincoln.

A law providing for a progressive inheritance tax, properly drafted, giving liberal exemptions, is the least burdensome of any tax law ever devised. It is inexpensive to operate. It makes its levies where they are the least burdensome and, besides raising a large amount of revenue for the administration of the Government, it curtails and greatly eliminates the danger to government and society which comes from the amassing and combining of large fortunes. The inheritance tax ought to be so drafted that it would permit exemptions sufficient for the testator to provide for the comfort and even the luxury of those dependent upon him during his life, and then the rate should progressively advance so as to make it impossible for a human being to continue combination and monopoly beyond the term of his natural life.

I have an abiding faith that all the great questions which confront us as a people will eventually be solved by the people and for the people; that the dangers of the future feared by Lincoln will be met by his descendants as fully and as patriotically as he and his advisors met the serious questions of government which confronted them in the dark days of the Civil War. We have his example. We have the benefit of his life. We have, I hope, in our hearts, his spirit, and, in this spirit, we will be faithful to the governmental doctrines for which he gave his life. We will profit by his example and follow his advice to the end that, in our own day, the prophetic words of the Savior of mankind will be exemplified and fulfilled, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth will make you free."

INVESTMENT TRUSTS

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the New York Times of yesterday under the headline "Investment Trusts." I would like to have it printed in the RECORD, because it is a matter about which at a later date I shall have something to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, September 8, 1929]

INVESTMENT TRUSTS

No one in touch with the ideas of Wall Street can have missed the prevalent impression that the stock market's recent activities have been associated with the immensely increased resources of the investment trusts. Since their transactions are conducted without publicity, it is possible that the market may misjudge at any given time their scope and direction; but the known facts are so extraordinary that the potential influence of this new financial machinery is not easy to overlook. The capital possesssed by enterprises of the kind has been enlarged with great suddenness and with almost incredible rapidity. In Doctor Robinson's pioneer textbook on the subject, published three years ago, the author referred to "the comparative paucity of investment trusts in the United States." The report by Attorney General Ottinger, of New York, in November, 1927, stated that "their paid-in capital probably exceeds $400,000,000," as against the $750,000,000 British investment trusts, and he did not assign them a powerful influence on the market of the day.

Last April, however, Doctor Robinson estimated roundly a billion dollars for the stock, bond, and debenture capital of existing American investment trusts, and the Financial Chronicle's careful compilations indicate that no less than $1,110,000,000 new stocks and bonds of investment trusts were issued in the seven months ending with last July. The Chronicle's figures actually show that these enterprises accounted for nearly one-third of the period's unprecedentedly large issues of new stock by American corporations of every description. Instead of slackening during the summer months, the offerings of new investment trust stock have been greatly accelerated. It has been calculated that, at the average rate of increase during 1929 to date, the full twelvemonth will have added between $2,000,000,000 and $2,500,000,000 to the capital resources of such companies.

It is not surprising that Wall Street should have pictured a wave of competitive buying on the stock exchange, simply in order to make use of these accumulating resources. It will hardly be supposed, however, that the enormous sums obtained through these recent issues of investment-trust stock are poured instantaneously into the speculative market. Blocks of securities may have been acquired on option or otherwise, before a company's own stock was placed. With Wall Street money rates at their recent height, great sums can for the time be profitably invested in the stock exchange call-money market. But the essential facts remain that the purpose for which this capital was raised was to buy securities, that statements of the companies usually show overwhelming predominance of stocks in their portfolio over bonds, and that the very rapid recent increase in their capital resources has occurred when prices for stocks were at the crest of a prolonged and sensational advance.

Under such circumstances, it is natural that discussion of the activities of these companies should reflect considerable bewilderment. On the one hand, pressure to invest this mass of new capital in line with the companies' purposes is necessarily strong; on the other, the principle of buying in a cheap market and selling in a dear market is an axiom of sound investment company finance. Inference as to what policy will be pursued, and with what results, varies widely, ranging from prediction that the companies will continue to buy in quantity at existing or still higher prices, in the belief that the advance can not be stopped, to prediction that at some point simultaneous "unloading" by them, in order not to be caught in a prolonged decline, may itself precipitate general reaction. A third possibility, that a great part of this new capital will be constantly shifted into and out of the market, stocks being bought on occasional brief set-backs of prices and possibly sold again on the ensuing rise, just now seems to appeal to the Wall Street mind.

This, it is true, would resemble less the traditional business of investment companies than the entry of rich corporations into the field of the "room trader" and "professional speculator." Yet the position is in all respects peculiar; not less so, certainly, with these huge resources becoming available at a moment when the present significance and future probabilities of the stock market itself are questions on which experienced financiers disagree—if they do not frankly admit suspended judgment.

PRINTING OF TARIFF DATA

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing a comparison of the rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 with the bill (H. R. 2667) as it passed the House and also with the bill (H. R. 2667) as amended by the Senate Finance Committee.

I desire to call attention to the fact that a similar statement of comparison of the rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the tariff act of 1922 with the House bill was printed June 19, 1929, as House Document No. 44.

The letter of transmittal, accompanying the statement, explains fully the basis upon which the statement was prepared.

The statement not only includes a comparison in the rates of duty and equivalent ad valorem rates in the present law with the House bill as it passed the House, but also includes the rates and equivalent ad valorems as amended by the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was the statement which the Senator proposes to have printed prepared under the direction of the Finance Committee?

Mr. SMOOT. It was prepared by the Tariff Commission at the request of the Finance Committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator says "it was prepared by the Tariff Commission"?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. The reason for having the statement printed is this: The comparison of rates which was printed on June 19, 1929, was based upon estimates of the revenue collected before the rebates and the fines were included. Now they have exactly the amount that was actually collected. It makes, however, very little difference in the record.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the comparative statement include the rates under the present law, the rates under the House bill, and those proposed by the bill as reported by a majority of the members of the Senate committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it includes those.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if the statement which he offers contains a comparison of the rate levied in 1922 with the rate that existed prior to that law?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator it does not.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It seems to me that at some later time such a comparison should be prepared. There have been two revisions, if the pending bill shall pass, of the tariff since the World War. We ought to have the rates which existed prior to that war in order to determine the extent of the increases or decreases that have been made since that time.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator refers to the tariff act of 1913, I will be very glad to have it prepared. I will say to the Senator that if I had had those figures I would have asked that they be included in this statement.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then we will have a complete picture of what has been done with reference to the tariff, or what has been attempted to be done, since the World War.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be very glad to comply with the Senator's request.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator how long will it take to prepare the schedules of the tariff act known as the Underwood-Simmons bill so that we could have this information all printed together?

Mr. SMOOT. I think perhaps it can be done within a week.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have them printed together for comparison. If it can not be done within the next two or three days, it seems to me the better course perhaps would be to have the statement which the Senator presents printed at this time, and we could then subsequently have a reprint with all the figures in one document. It could be done in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the statement which I have requested to be printed has already been set up, and is ready to be printed just as soon as the order is made.

Mr. SWANSON. I offer as an amendment to the request of the Senator from Utah—and I hope he will not object—to have the statement he has made first printed, and as soon as there can be prepared a statement of the rates in the Underwood-Simmons Act that a second print shall be made including those rates along with the figures which the Senator now presents.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever, Mr. President, to that being done.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will allow me, whether he is willing to include an index to the bill in his request? There is no index now, and if we are going to reprint the bill, it seems to me there ought to be an index.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the statement which I have asked be printed begins with the first paragraph in Schedule 1 and takes up every paragraph that follows in the bill. We will have, however, in the next few days, an index of the bill by itself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I could not hear the Senator's statement and therefore wish to ask, Does the comparative print which he is asking to have made contemplate the printing of the latest available figures of domestic production and imports and the relation of imports to domestic production?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement I have presented is merely a comparison of the rates. There is no reason, so far as I can see, for including what the Senator suggests in the statement which I have asked to have printed. The figures, of course, may be obtained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize that; but, as I remember, when one of the previous tariff revisions was under consideration by the Senate a comparative print by paragraphs was published, and along with it such data as I have suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. Such a comparative print will be out within a couple of days, showing exactly the law of 1922, the changes made by the House in that law, and the changes proposed by the bill as reported by the Senate committee. As to each paragraph of the bill, the print will show exactly the changes which have been made by the House to existing law and by the Senate Finance Committee to the House provisions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would it not be possible also to have printed in another column the statistics, where they are available, as to domestic production and imports of products affected by the tariff schedules? I make this suggestion to the Senator because, although I know that the information is contained in the Tariff Survey, nevertheless it would be very convenient for the use of the Senate if we could have those figures opposite the paragraphs in the comparative print.

Mr. SMOOT. The volume would be so long that it would be absolutely impossible to handle it on the desks of Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would only add one more column.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; it would add several.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And I am sure that such a print was prepared when one of the previous revisions was under consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. A summary of the tariff, I will say, will be placed on the desk of every Senator. Taking the bill which I have on my desk—and each Senator will have one of the same kind—the page of the tariff summary which is pertinent is noted opposite every item. For instance, as to paragraph 398, reference to that will be found on page 908 of the summary of the tariff. Therefore we have that information complete. It would not be possible to put the summary alongside of each paragraph in the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand we could not get it all; but what I am asking is that the figures which are available on domestic production and imports and the relation of imports to domestic production be printed. They would not take up a great amount of space, and I think they would be of great use to the Senate in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to address a question to the Senator for the purpose of eliciting information quite like that sought by the Senator from Wisconsin. When the 1922 tariff bill was before us we were provided by the Tariff Commission with a compilation, making up quite a volume, in which there was given with respect to each particular item mentioned in the tariff bill information concerning production in the United States, importations, consumption, the source abroad from which the commodity comes, the use to which it is ordinarily put when that is not commonly and generally known, the labor cost entering into the production of the article, and other pertinent and very valuable information of that character. The volume proved of exceedingly great service. I have several times since endeavored to get a copy of that work, but the most diligent search by my secretary has yielded nothing. I do not know what has become of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Has not the Senator received a summary of the tariff? It is a volume that thick [indicating]. I instructed the clerk of the Finance Committee to see that every Senator received one. I think there are three or four thousand pages in the volume, giving just the information which the Senator seeks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not received a copy of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that it has been printed; and, not only that, but I will assure all Senators that if they have not received a copy they will receive it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am glad to have that assurance from the Senator. I rose to inquire whether we were to be supplied with a similar document.

Mr. SMOOT. I will see that every Senator is supplied with a copy. I thought they had been already furnished with one.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By whom has the statement, which the Senator presents, been compiled?

Mr. SMOOT. By the Tariff Commission.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question dealing with the statement which he presents. I received this morning Senate committee print of Comparison of Rates of Duty in the Pending Tariff Bill of 1929 with the Present Law. The Senator, of course, saw that before it was printed?

Mr. SMOOT. I did.

Mr. HARRISON. That document contains a comparison of the ad valorem percentages of the pending bill as reported by the Senate committee, the ad valorem rates as carried in the bill which was passed by the House, and the rates of the present law. I am wondering why in this print the percentage of increase made by the House bill over the present law was not included as well as the percentage of increase in rates provided by the Senate committee amendments over the present law?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see that any real information would have been furnished if that had been done. The Senator knows very well that if he wants to figure out the percentages, it will take him only a short time to ascertain exactly what they are, if he desires to have the information.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator says that he does not see any value in a report that would show the percentage of increase schedule by schedule made by the House bill over the present law as well as that made by the Senate Committee over the present law.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. HARRISON. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. SMOOT. The document itself shows exactly what the rate was in the 1922 act; it shows exactly what changes were made by the House; and it also shows exactly what amendments were reported by the Senate Finance Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I am familiar with that fact; but I am wondering why the document does not contain the increases by percentages made in this bill over the present rates and by the House bill over the present rates. Let me get down to this point.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator for a moment.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator speaks about the percentage of increases only. Why not decreases?

Mr. HARRISON. Or decreases; I will accept the suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are there any decreases?

Mr. HARRISON. There is a decrease in one schedule, which will be analyzed presently.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, what the Senator wants is a percentage of decrease upon a decrease——

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what it is.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator can not confuse the issue in that way.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what the Senator is asking for, as I understand him, or the percentage of increase over a decrease.

Mr. HARRISON. Here is exactly what the Senator from Mississippi wants. I have it myself. I knew how to get it.

Mr. SMOOT. Anybody can get it.

Mr. HARRISON. And it is very enlightening. But I was wondering why in the preparation of this document to be used by Senators in the tariff debate the percentage of increase in each schedule in this bill over the present law is not included.

Mr. SMOOT. I told the Senator that, so far as I was personally concerned, I did not see any advantage whatever in that. The figures might be entirely misleading.

Mr. HARRISON. They would not be misleading.

Mr. SMOOT. They might be very misleading.

Mr. HARRISON. A statement of the percentage of increase in each schedule would be very enlightening as to what it is proposed to do.

Now, I wish to ask the Senator another question. This document was prepared by the Tariff Commission, as I understand?

Mr. SMOOT. It was.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator see it before it went to the Public Printer?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I saw it.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask if the Tariff Commission did not include the percentage of increase schedule by schedule in the rates proposed by the Senate committee over those in the present law and the percentage of increase made by the House bill over the present law, and if it was not stricken out before the document went to the printer for publication?

Mr. SMOOT. Not only the increases but the decreases as well were stricken out, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. They were stricken out?

Mr. SMOOT. They were.

Mr. HARRISON. Why were they stricken out?

Mr. SMOOT. Because, so far as I was concerned, I did not see any use at all of the figures being put in the compilation.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator object to another printing being made showing those increases?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have no objection at all, none whatever, if the Senator wants that done.

Mr. HARRISON. I am curious to understand why the Senator struck out these percentages of increase when they were prepared by the Tariff Commission and were to be printed by the Government Printing Office. Why did the Senator constitute himself a censor to strike out those percentages of increase?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah did not think it was necessary to have the document show a percentage of increase on an increase or a percentage of decrease on a decrease in the case of any rate that may be passed by the House and amended by the Senate. For instance, if the House bill placed on any article, say, a duty of 1 cent a pound, as it did on certain agricultural products, and that duty was increased to 3 cents a pound by the Senate committee, why should we have printed there a statement that that was an increase of 200 per cent? It would only be misleading, and I thought it was perfectly useless to have it done. If, however, the Senator wants it done, I am perfectly willing to have it printed, and he can use it in any way he desires.

Mr. HARRISON. I am going to put it in the RECORD now, so that those who want this information that was procured from the Tariff Commission can get it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

Mr. HARRISON. This is what the Senator struck out. May I read it, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi for that purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. In the chemical schedule, Schedule No. 1, the percentage of increase in the House bill over the present rate is 10.28 per cent. In the Senate bill the increase over the present law is 1.74 per cent.

In the earthenware schedule, Schedule 2, the percentage of increase over the present law carried by the House bill is 20.65 per cent. The Senate bill carries an increase of 17.42 per cent over the present law.

In metals there is an increase in the House bill of 7.88 per cent. The Senate bill shows a decrease of 12.76 per cent because of manganese being placed on the free list. With manganese carrying the same rate of duty as in the present law there would be an increase of 5 per cent plus in the metal schedule over the present law.

In wood and manufactures of wood the House bill carries an increase of 59.87 per cent over the present law. The Senate bill carries a decrease of 1.20 per cent from the present law.

In the sugar schedule the increase carried in the House bill is 36.12 per cent over the present law. In the Senate bill there is an increase of 24.90 per cent over the present law.

In tobacco there is no increase and no decrease.

Mr. SMOOT. There was an increase in the House.

Mr. HARRISON. In the House there was an increase of 6.14 per cent. In the Senate bill there is no increase and no decrease.

In the agricultural schedule there is an increase in the House bill of 48.93 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase of 44.80 per cent.

On spirits and wines there is an increase in the House bill of 22.32 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase over the present law of 22.32 per cent.

In the cotton-manufactures schedule there is an increase in the House bill over the present law of 8.24 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase of .5 per cent over the present law.

In the flax, hemp, and jute schedule there is an increase in the House bill over the present law of 3.49 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase over the present law of 4.19 per cent.

In the wool schedule in the House bill there is an increase over the present law of 16.99 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase over the present law of 14.51 per cent.

In the silk schedule there is an increase in the House bill over the present law of 6.38 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase of 10.41 per cent.

In the rayon schedule there is an increase of seventeen one-hundredths of 1 per cent in the House bill over the present law. In the Senate bill there is an increase of 2.11 per cent.

In the paper and pulp schedule there is an increase in the House bill of 6.64 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase over the present law of 6.60 per cent.

In the sundries schedule there is an increase in the House bill over the present law of 37.95 per cent. In the Senate bill there is an increase over the present law of 27.76 per cent.

It seems to me that those figures speak for themselves; and I can understand why the Senator struck them out before this report was printed by the Government Printing Office.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is not any information in the statement just made by the Senator that any Senator could not obtain in regard to any item by looking at the report. The report will show exactly what the percentages of increases or decreases from present law and changes made by Senate to House rates. What the Senator wants is to show the percentages of increases on increases or decreases on decreases on House amendments to the present. It seems perfectly foolish to me to print any such percentages.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Referring to the inquiry made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], as I understand, these tariff-information reports consist of about 15 volumes. They were originally printed for the use of the House. The members of the Finance Committee have had the use of these reports, and they have been very helpful to them and full of very valuable information; but the individual Members of the Senate have not received these reports. There must be some in print, because I have been able to purchase them for my constituents at the cost of $3.75 for a complete set. May I suggest to the Senator that he present an order for the printing of additional volumes of the tariff-information reports, and that a certain number of them be sent to each Member of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I think one or two have been sent to each Senator already. If not, I shall ask to have that done.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is a fact that members of the committee have had them, but it is also a fact that the Members of the Senate generally have not had the use of these volumes; and they are indispensable in making any examination of these rates.

Mr. SMOOT. I have received a great number of them from the House document room, and when any Senator has asked me for them I have sent them to the Senator and told him there was no need of making the request through me, that he could get them himself; but it will not make any difference. If the House has not a sufficient number, I will see that the Senate orders a sufficient number for anybody that wants them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think it is as essential that Senators should be supplied with these different pamphlets that have been gotten out by the Tariff Commission as it is that the Senate should have those pamphlets contained in one publication.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I will have done.

Mr. SIMMONS. When we considered the last tariff bill, as the Senator from Montana has stated, there was upon the desk of every Senator before we began the consideration of the bill a book that contained all of this tariff information that had been gathered. It constituted in a large measure the facts upon which rates should be made, and upon which increases or decreases should be justified or demanded. No book that has ever been published, no document or printed information that has ever been furnished, has been so valuable to Senators in the consideration of tariff bills as that book that was placed on our desks when we considered the bill of 1922. It saved an enormous amount of time in the discussion and consideration of the bill, and it enabled Senators in all parts of the Chamber immediately to ascertain the facts or give the facts which would tend to support or contradict statements that might be made by other Senators upon this floor. It was absolutely invaluable. It helped tremendously in expediting the consideration of that bill.

Mr. President, I have had prepared for my own use a book in which all of these different pamphlets are consolidated. I find it very useful to me; but it is astonishing to me that the Senator who speaks for the majority of this body upon this bill should not have adverted to the fact that we had this matter printed for the benefit of all Senators the last time, and arranged to have a similar book printed for the use of Senators this time.

The Senator says we can get these pamphlets. Of course we can; there are plenty of them, I suppose; but we want the book consolidating these different pamphlets.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will get the book, with his name on it, and every other Senator will get it.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I do not have it. The one I have I had to have especially prepared for my own use. I have not a copy of the official book, and I have not seen a Senator who has it. When will we get it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in one volume the Tariff Commission's reports to the extent to which the law will allow us to print them. I will assure the Senator that that will supply all of the Senators and perhaps a great many more persons.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator propose that we shall not have these books until the whole thing can be reprinted?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, it will not take very long.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or does the Senator propose that these different pamphlets shall be bound together in one volume?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. After I hear the answer of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, those pamphlets are all printed in schedules—Schedules 1 to 16.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know they are.

Mr. SMOOT. What I propose to do is to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to print the number of each of those pamphlets that the law will allow us to print, and then I will see that they are bound and the name of each Senator put upon the book and that book placed upon his desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. How long will that take?

Mr. SMOOT. Only a short time.

Mr. SIMMONS. What does the Senator mean by "a short time"—a day or a week?

Mr. SMOOT. We ought to be able to get it in two or three days. Work will be started on it at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is very unfortunate that we have it not at the very beginning of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought that every Senator who wanted to know anything about the bill, if the document was not in our document room—and it was not, because it is a House document—could simply have asked the House for the document.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a suggestion, every member of the Finance Committee has available, ready to-day, a book like this [exhibiting volume], which consolidates all of the 15 pamphlets in one volume.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly; but what I desire is that every Senator upon this floor shall be supplied with that book.

Mr. REED. I think the Government Printing Office can have that ready for every Senator within two or three days. It ought not to take longer than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator is right, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. So that there will be no mistake about it, I desire to say to the Senator that we already have a copy for every member of the committee. Under the law we could not print that number if we printed every one that we could print. I will state that my request now is that we print, schedule by schedule, the tariff information reports used by the House as furnished by the Tariff Commission, and that we bind those schedules in one book similar to the one just exhibited by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and have the name of each Senator placed upon one of those books and have it delivered at his desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, while the majority members of the committee may have been supplied with the book which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just exhibited, I am advised that the minority Senators have not been.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that I had to go out and arrange personally to have my copy prepared.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the first time it has ever been done. Every other tariff bill that has been considered has been taken up schedule by schedule, and the figures have been taken from the House hearings. This is the first time that such figures have been bound in one volume together.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it may be the first time we have incorporated all such pamphlets in one volume, but the book of reference we had during the consideration of the act now on the statute books was a book which contained all the essential information found in the various publications issued by the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the same thing, up to date.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we can get these publications bound together in one book that will be satisfactory, but I want to impress upon the Senator that he has not provided the minority members of the committee with that book, although the majority members may have it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will procure the printing and binding of the reports of the Tariff Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I now ask for action on my request to have printed in the RECORD the statement showing a comparison of the rates of duty, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter which Mr. SMOOT requested to have printed in the RECORD is as follows:

COMPARISON OF RATES OF DUTY IN THE PENDING TARIFF BILL OF 1929 WITH THE PRESENT LAW—A STATEMENT SHOWING A COMPARISON OF THE RATES OF DUTY AND EQUIVALENT AD VALOREM RATES IN THE TARIFF ACT OF 1922 WITH THE BILL (H. R. 2667) TO PROVIDE REVENUE, TO REGULATE COMMERCE WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES, TO ENCOURAGE THE INDUSTRIES OF THE UNITED STATES, TO PROTECT AMERICAN LABOR, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES—ARRANGED ACCORDING TO SCHEDULES AND PARAGRAPHS IN THE BILL H. R. 2667

(Compiled by the U. S. Tariff Commission)

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION,
Washington, September 3, 1929.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Finance,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: There are transmitted herewith 16 tables prepared by the United States Tariff Commission, which show by schedules and paragraphs a comparison of the rates of duty under the tariff act of 1922 and as proposed in the bill H. R. 2667, both as passed by the House of Representatives and as reported with amendments by the Finance Committee to the Senate. The first table shows a summary by schedules and the remaining tables show, by paragraphs, the rates in Schedules 1 to 15 numbered according to the pending bill.

The imports for the calendar year 1928 are used as the basis for the calculations contained in the accompanying tables and include all imports during that year under the dutiable paragraphs. The computed duties shown in the tables were calculated by applying to the 1928 imports the several rates of duty under the act of 1922, under the pending bill H. R. 2667 as passed by the House, and under the same bill as reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee.

The imports for 1928 as used were compiled by taking for each schedule and paragraph of the dutiable list the articles actually dutiable under the tariff act of 1922 and adding thereto the amount of imports of all articles transferred from the free list to the dutiable list by the pending bill as passed by the House or as reported by the Senate committee. The imports of articles proposed in the bill to be transferred to the free list remain in the basic figures of imports for 1928. Thus transfers from and to the free list were taken into consideration and all articles dutiable under either the present law or the pending bill or the Senate committee amendments are included in the imports for 1928. For these reasons the averages of imports and of the ad valorem duties for each schedule as a whole and for those paragraphs in which such transfers have been made will not agree with published statistics of imports in 1928 under the present law.

At the end of some of the schedules statistics are shown for certain paragraphs for which comparisons could not be drawn because of the differences in classification in the pending bill as compared with the present law.

Very truly yours,

ALFRED P. DENNIS,
Acting Chairman.

UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION

COMPARATIVE RATES OF DUTY AND EQUIVALENT AD VALOREM RATES IN THE TARIFF ACT OF 1922 AND IN THE BILL H. R. 2667 AS PASSED BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES WITH ADJUSTMENTS BY THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE BASED UPON IMPORTS FOR CONSUMPTION DURING THE CALENDAR YEAR 1928, ARRANGED ACCORDING TO SCHEDULES AND PARAGRAPHS IN THE BILL H. R. 2667

Schedules 1 to 15

[c] Transferred to free list, par. 1761.
[d] Imports under par. 1700 are not included. Data not available.
[e] Posts transferred to free list, under H. R. 2667.
[f] Rate on paintbrush handles changed by presidential proclamation from 33⅓ per cent to 16⅔ per cent ad valorem, effective Nov. 13, 1926.
[g] Includes bent-wood furniture for which H. R. 2667 provides a rate of 55 per cent ad valorem. As import data are not segregated to show the proportion of bent-wood furniture included, duties to show the effect of H. R. 2667 have been computed on the basis of minimum increase—40 per cent ad valorem. This is the rate which will probably apply to the bulk of the imports.

[1] Rates of duty are not shown where more than one rate is involved.

[a] When bleached, dyed, or otherwise treated, an additional duty of 2 cents per pound is levied. This additional duty is not included in the computed duty under H. R. 2667.

[b] See figures at end of schedule for other imports of cordage.

[c] Duty shall be the same rate as is imposed upon any of the threads, twines, or cord of which the mesh is made, plus 10 per cent ad valorem. As statistics do not show the value of the thread, the rate of 50 per cent ad valorem has been applied to the value of the nets.

[d] If the pile is partly cut, the duty under H. R. 2667 becomes 50 per cent. Data are not available for computing the additional duty under this provision.

[e] Duty-free imports of cordage from the Philippines in 1928 amounted to 5,659,967 pounds, valued at $732,037.

			In the following paragraphs the proposed changes in classification in the H. R. 2667 are such that the rates of duty therein can not be applied to the import statistics for 1928. The data shown below for these paragraphs are therefore omitted from the comparable totals above.

[1] Rates of duty are not shown where more than one rate is involved.
[a] Application of various rates based upon analysis of invoice data.
[b] Senate bill provides for additional 50 cents per pound on yarns of 20 turns twist per inch. It is estimated 144,206 pounds (value $176,364) would be at this rate.
[c] Includes rayon sewing thread, etc., transferred under H. R. 2667 to par. 1304.
[d] Rayon silk noils were held dutiable as rayon waste under T. D. 41362.
[e] Includes small amounts of cellulose acetate rayon waste transferred under H. R. 2667 to par. 31.
[f] Under H. R. 2667 rayon noils carry a higher duty than waste. As import statistics are not segregated, the effect of this increase can not be shown.
[g] For items for which duties can not be compared see figure for par. 1302 at end of schedule.
[h] Imports not segregated included in "plied rayon yarns" in par. 1301.
[i] Duties can not be compared—see composite total for "Sundry imports of rayon and manufactures of" at end of schedule.
[j] Figures given do not cover knit fabrics and knit goods of artificial horsehair, visca, or cellophane which are included in the composite total for "Sundry imports of rayon and manufactures of" at end of schedule.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint Resolution 126 A

Joint resolution relating to the appointment of a collector of customs of the joint port of Duluth and Superior

Whereas there is at present a vacancy in the office of collector of customs of the joint port of Duluth and Superior; and

Whereas slightly more than one-half of the tonnage of the joint port is at Superior and yet Superior has never had the collectorship of the port: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully petitions the President of the United States to appoint as collector of customs of the joint port of Duluth and Superior a citizen of Wisconsin; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to both Senators from Wisconsin, and to the Member of Congress from the eleventh Wisconsin congressional district.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I present resolutions adopted at a public mass meeting at Memphis, Tenn., on September 1, 1929, in reference to the massacre of Jews in Palestine, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at public mass meeting, Memphis, Tenn., September 1, 1929

Many of our innocent Jewish men, women, and children are being massacred in Palestine, one of them, unfortunately, one of our own boys, David Shainberg; may his soul rest in peace. You should spare no effort to condemn the Palestine administration, as distinguished from the London Government, for its criminal negligence and incompetence, resulting in the prevailing disorders, pillage, and murders.

Therefore the Memphis Chapter of Hadassah has adopted the following resolutions making these demands on the British Government:

First. Effective restoration of law and order.

Second. Punishment of direct and indirect offenders and instigators.

Third. Removal of all incompetent officials and those not in sympathy with the mandate.

Fourth. Reorganization of the police, with the inclusion of a large percentage of Jews, and organization of adequate military forces.

Fifth. Adequate compensation for loss of life and property.

Sixth. Renewed and increased immigration of Jews.

Seventh. Just settlement of the problem of the Wailing Wall through government expropriation of property after adequate compensation.

Last, but most important, a full restatement of the Government policy as to its intentions to carry into effect the purpose of the Balfour declaration.

(Copies of the resolutions are to be sent to Senator K. D. McKELLAR and to the 10 Congressmen from Tennessee, as well as to Secretary of State H. L. Stimson.)

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I present resolutions of the New Iberia (La.) Chamber of Commerce, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been widespread misunderstanding relative to certain facts bearing on the sugar industry in its economic aspects; and

Whereas such public misunderstanding as exists and which is reflected in the press in many sections may have an influence on the action of the Congress of the United States, which is presently considering an upward revision of the tariff on sugar: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we make the following declaration with the purpose in view of correcting erroneous beliefs and impressions:

(1) The proposed increase in the sugar tariff as contained in the Hawley-Smoot bill now before Congress will not and can not work any appreciable hardship on the consumers of sugar in the United States. The hue and cry to that effect has undoubtedly been engineered by interests having sugar-producing plants in foreign countries and does not emanate naturally from the consumers themselves because, by the most liberal estimate, such increase in the tariff can not entail a greater per capita expense than 38 cents a year, which is too small an amount to cause anybody concern.

(2) The price of sugar is exceedingly low, being far below the index line of nearly all other food commodities. In order that the domestic producers of sugar may not be forced out of business by cheap Cuban sugar made under labor conditions with which the people of the United States can not compete, the tariff that has been asked for, 2.40 cents per pound against Cuba, is necessary.

(3) The domestic sugar industry stands as the only safeguard against foreign control in this important commodity. In 1920 when Cuba dominated the situation sugar prices went to 23 cents a pound. With the domestic sugar industry out of business, as it will be if the increased tariff asked for is not granted, Cuba will dominate the situation all the time. Thirty-eight cents a year is cheap insurance against that.

(4) The production of sugar cane and sugar beets is one farming industry that may be expanded enormously before we have a domestic surplus. Thousands upon thousands of acres now in such crops as corn and wheat that are being produced in troublesome superabundance can and will go into sugar if the modest protection, 2.40 cents a pound against Cuba, is granted. Thousands of farmers, now disquieted and at their wits' end as to what to do because they can not sell their surplus crops, will find salvation and prosperity in cane and beets, and the prosperity of these farmers will be reflected in the factories in the cities and in the marts of trade.

(5) It being recognized that the domestic-sugar industry is in urgent need of a higher tariff than has been accorded it in previous years, and when it is realized that the producers of sugar cane have sustained tremendous losses for several years past by reason of the ravages of pest and diseases, it is, therefore, imperative that any benefits accruing from an increased tariff should be made effective for the crop of 1929; be it further

Resolved, That we denounce as un-American, unpatriotic, and reprehensible the attitude assumed in certain quarters and echoed by certain newspaper that Cubans and Filipinos deserve to be taken care of at the expense of, and through the destruction of, American taxpayers and citizens; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Hon. Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, and to each Senator and Representative from Louisiana; to the publicity department of the Domestic Sugar Producers' Association, Washington, D. C.; and to the leading newspapers of Louisiana and Mississippi.

NEW IBERIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
FRANCIS J. VOORHIES, President.

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the American Legion in Kings County, N. Y., which were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas it has been for years a matter of public comment that the location and space of the court room allotted for the naturalization court of this district is entirely unfitted and inadequate for its very important purpose and thereby lowers the dignity of the ceremony attendant on the making of new citizens; and

Whereas the unnecessary and prolonged neglect in providing a court room of proper size for this important function was recently called to the attention of the Kings County organization of the American Legion by the local director of naturalization; and

Whereas the American Legion believes that the process of naturalization is a ceremony that should be conducted with solemnity in a manner to impress the new-born citizen and amidst proper surroundings: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in Kings County convention assembled, That all the Congressmen of Kings County be urged to remedy the present condition by asking the Government to provide proper facilities for the purpose above set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Congressman from Kings County.

Mr. WAGNER also presented resolutions adopted by the American Legion of Kings County, N. Y., which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the American Legion advocates universal and lasting peace and approves heartily all efforts to secure that end; and

Whereas the American Legion believes in adequate preparedness for national defense; and

Whereas the American Legion believes that our national security may best be safeguarded by the maintenance of a navy on a parity with respect to all classes of ships with the navy of any other power; and

Whereas the American Legion believes further that preponderance of naval armament by any one power breeds war and stimulates the spirit of conquest; and

Whereas the American Navy is not now on a parity with some of the navies of other great powers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Kings County American Legion in convention assembled reaffirm its oft-proclaimed stand in favor of universal and lasting peace; and be it further

Resolved, That the Kings County American Legion hereby advocates the establishment of naval parity in all classes of naval ships by all leading naval powers; and be it further

Resolved, That the Kings County American Legion hereby indorses the stand of our national commander, Paul V. McNutt, regarding the principle of parity as the best method of placing the Government of the United States in the strongest possible position to demand proportional universal and gradual reduction of all naval armament in an effort to bring about universal and lasting peace; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency the President of the United States, to the United States Senators from New York, to the Representatives in Congress from Brooklyn, and to the convention of the American Legion, Department of New York, for indorsement.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Independence, Kans., praying for the passage of legislation granting increased pensions to Civil War veterans and their widows, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of Jews in Detroit, Mich., favoring the calling upon the British Government not only to suppress the present outrages against Jewish lives and property in Palestine but to prevent their recurrence, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENTS TO THE TARIFF BILL

Mr. BROUSSARD submitted three amendments and Mr. McKELLAR submitted four amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 2667, the tariff revision bill, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REPORTS OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ON WATER POWER

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit a Senate resolution and ask that it be read. Then I shall ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 112), as follows:

Resolved, That as a part of its reports to the Senate, pursuant to Senate Resolution 83, Seventieth Congress, first session, the Federal Trade Commission be required expeditiously to transmit duplicates, or true copies, of all exhibits introduced into its record in hearings held and to be held pursuant to said resolution, and that they be printed as parts of said reports, to accompany the respective parts thereof printed in accordance with Senate Resolution 221 of May 3, 1928, except that as to copyrighted books, bulky volumes, and other lengthy exhibits only such descriptions thereof and pertinent extracts therefrom shall be printed as the Federal Trade Commission may indicate and transmit with such exhibits for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will not the Senator allow the resolution to go over until to-morrow?

Mr. NORRIS. I will, yes, if the Senator would like to look into it. I may say to the Senator that the only object I am seeking is to settle the question as to what shall be printed in connection with the Federal Trade Commission water-power investigation.

Mr. FESS. I do not think I shall have any objection to the resolution, but I would like to look into it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To what investigation does the resolution refer?

Mr. NORRIS. It refers to the so-called water-power investigation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should say in this connection, Mr. President, that an enormous number of exhibits have been introduced, many of them very lengthy, indeed. In the case of many of them the pertinent matter is included within perhaps a single paragraph of quite a bulky document.

I have had some correspondence with the general counsel for the commission, whose services in this connection have been noteworthy, with a view to making some kind of a selection from the exhibits of such matter as seems to be relevant or pertinent, instead of attempting to secure the publication of the entire lot, which would seem to be not only needlessly expensive, but with respect to most of the matter that which is of any particular value would be hidden away. I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska consider these suggestions in connection with his resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the suggestions are very timely. In fact, the object of the resolution is to settle the question to which the Senator has referred. Some of the documents submitted as exhibits are very lengthy; some of them consist of large volumes, and in some cases reference is made to only a paragraph. The same applies to reports. In some cases a large part of a report is of interest to nobody. In my judgment, it would be objectionable to print all the documents, since it would be of no use even to the student who wanted to get at the truth about the matter.

This resolution puts upon the Federal Trade Commission the responsibility of making the selection. It seems to me somebody must decide, unless we are going to print all the information, how much shall be printed and what shall be printed, and my object in offering the resolution was to put upon the Federal Trade Commission the responsibility of deciding what shall be printed and how much shall be printed. Perhaps it is a good idea to have the resolution go over, as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, so that other Senators may look into it; but, briefly stated, that was the object I had in view.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

TARIFF COMMISSION INFORMATION

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I offer a Senate resolution, which has already been sent to the desk, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 113), as follows:

Resolved, That on request of any Senator, the Finance Committee of the Senate is hereby directed to obtain from the Tariff Commission complete and full information, whether confidential or otherwise, within its possession, pertaining to any subject matter contained in House bill 2667, entitled "An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes." All such information so obtained shall be accessible to each Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McMASTER. No; I do not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

INCOME-TAX AND CAPITAL-STOCK-TAX RETURNS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 108) submitted by Mr. SIMMONS on the 5th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is directed forthwith to request the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to the authority vested in it under the internal revenue laws, to furnish the committee, at the earliest practicable date, a statement in detail for each of the taxable years 1922 to 1928, inclusive, of the profits or losses, as the case may be, of the taxpayers whose names the committee, or the majority or minority members thereof, may from time to time during the consideration by the Congress of the pending tariff legislation transmit to the Secretary as being the names of taxpayers whose products or manufactures are, in the opinion of the committee, or of the majority or minority members thereof, affected by the pending tariff legislation—in so far as such profits or losses are contained in or shown by the income tax and capital stock tax returns of such taxpayers, segregated, so far as may be practicable, to show the profits or losses, as the case may be, in the several branches or departments of the business of such taxpayers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to insert before the phrase "of the taxpayers," in line 7, page 1:

And a separate statement for each of said years of each of the following items:

Gross sales from trading or manufacturing less goods returned, and any allowances or discounts from the sale and price; and

(a) Inventory at beginning and close of each year.

(b) Merchandise bought for sale for each year.

(c) Cost of manufacturing or otherwise producing goods separately: (1) Salaries and wages exclusive of compensation of officers; (2) material and supplies; (3) compensation of officers; and separately the total amount for each year returns are made as shown by the information filed, giving the determinable income of $1,500 or more per single person, or $3,500 or more per married person, classified as follows: (a) Salaries, (b) wages, exclusive of compensation of officers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I myself have no objection to the amendment; but I do not feel authorized to accept it, so I will leave it to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, I would like to address an inquiry to the Senator from North Carolina. Take the case of a corporation which, through subsidiary corporations, may be manufacturing various articles, or a general corporation manufacturing various articles. Under the Senator's resolution would we be able to get information as to the profits arising from the manufacture of a single article? Would his resolution classify those matters?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the resolution covers that, and that under the resolution as originally offered the committee would be required, upon request of either the minority or majority members, to ascertain the costs and profits on any branch or part of any manufacturing or other producing interest or industry, including not only the costs and profits of the parent corporation but those of its subsidiaries as constituting a factor in the total investment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the language in the last clause is, "To show the profits or losses, as the case may be, in the several branches or departments of the business of such taxpayers."

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. That would seem to cover the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. It seems to cover it, and was written with a view to covering it; but I recognize the fact that many big factories or lines of industry in this country have many subsidiaries, and I thought it was necessary to have the information not only with reference to the profits of the parent corporation, so to speak, but with reference to the profits of every branch held or controlled, directly or indirectly, by the parent corporation, or by some holding company that might be set up for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from North Carolina was going to speak to his resolution, but he informs me that he does not care to speak at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is a little bit in error. I did desire to present some observations, but I thought it would be better to vote first upon the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin has offered to the resolution which I have proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. I may have misunderstood the Senator, but that is what I understood to be his desire.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is perfectly satisfactory so far as I am concerned to have the Senator discuss the resolution as it is now before the Senate.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	Connally	Gould	Keyes
Ashurst	Couzens	Greene	King
Barkley	Dale	Hale	La Follette

Mr. SCHALL. My colleague [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is detained from the Senate by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a very brief discussion of the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina will suffice to point out its apparent purposes. As soon as these purposes are fully appreciated, I shall be very glad to hasten a vote upon it.

If Senators will devote but a moment's consideration to the resolution, I am convinced that they will be forced to conclude that the resolution is not being pressed for the purpose of obtaining and making available information relevant to the pending tariff bill. In the first place, Mr. President, the information in which the Senator from North Carolina now professes to be interested is readily available, in practically every instance, through current and periodical corporation reports. Approximately 1,000 corporations, including practically every large corporation in the United States, are publishing regularly through the financial press, either monthly, quarterly, or annually, detailed and reliable statements of their earnings for the preceding period. Anyone interested in obtaining information regarding a particular corporation can obtain the current information desired from such publications as the Wall Street Journal, the Commercial and Financial Chronicle, and the publications of the Standard Statistics Co. (Inc.), all of which are available at regular and frequent intervals. It may be interesting to know that the New York Stock Exchange, almost without exception, refuses to list bonds or stocks of a corporation which will not enter into a contract in advance to make public its balance sheet and income statement at least annually. For persons interested solely in corporation profits by industrial groups, disregarding the individual corporations, various sources of information are available, such as the Monthly Review of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the Monthly Letter of the National City Bank of New York, and similar publications.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I would very much prefer not to yield. I would like to present my statement in its regular order and after I have concluded I am perfectly willing to undertake to answer any questions.

I am submitting herewith without reading, and ask that it be incorporated as a part of my remarks, a list of the specific corporations known to be releasing regularly for publication statements regarding their income, which are published in the current financial press. I hold in my hand the list of the companies. Every company mentioned here publishes at least quarterly a complete statement which is furnished to the American people. I do not know but that I ought to take the time now to call attention to the hundreds of them. The list includes, beginning with the United States Steel Corporation, every large manufacturing concern and every large business concern in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it includes the Aluminum Co. of America?

Mr. SMOOT. It does.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I just entered the Chamber. May I inquire what the Senator is reading?

Mr. SMOOT. This is a list of the specific corporations known to be releasing quarterly for publication statements regarding their incomes, which are published in the current financial press of the country. I do not want to take the time to read all of the names, but I ask Senators to look at the RECORD to-morrow and see how complete the list is. This is not all by any means, but it is a list of those that publish at least quarterly the actual financial conditions of their company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah ask to have the list printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President; I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

Stone, H. O.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. I understood him to state that the companies, a list of which he has just presented to the Senate, issue quarterly statements which appear in certain particular trade publications to which he has referred and that the information therein contained might thus be made available to Senators through those publications. In view of the fact that the statements are so issued, why does the Senator object to our asking the Treasury Department to give us the information?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps if the Senator will wait until I conclude he will learn why.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we get it from the Treasury Department, then Senators may have the benefit of it without having to subscribe to and read the trade publications to which the Senator refers.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to proceed, I think he will learn why before I get through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt the Treasury Department will be able to make out a pretty strong case against any publicity of this sort.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to proceed and present my statement in order, because I think that it is an important question which is now before the Senate. I think I ought to be allowed to proceed and conclude my statement without any further interruption.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I will say to the Senator, if he will pardon me, that in view of what he has said I shall not interrupt him further. I did not know that he would object to interruptions.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to conclude without further interruption.

Mr. SIMMONS. I realize the propriety of the Senator's request and shall not interrupt him further.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, has the Senator from North Carolina made any effort to obtain these reports? Has he determined that they are insufficient? Has his examination of them convinced him that they are unreliable? Has he been unable to obtain current reports for all the corporations in which he, for the first time, now professes an interest? If current reports as to certain corporations are lacking, has the Senator prior to this time made any effort to obtain them? Has the Senator, the minority leader of the Finance Committee, made any effort within the last three months to have the committee exercise the power given it by the law to obtain the information which he now thinks is essential? If the Senator truly believes that an examination of income-tax returns will yield information valuable in the consideration of the pending bill, why has he delayed until the present time any effort to obtain that information?

In the second place, anyone familiar with the information contained in income-tax returns knows that they do not give really relevant information. True profits and losses are not shown and can not be ascertained from the data given on an income-tax return. Our revenue laws have built up, and necessarily so, an artificial and rather arbitrary definition of taxable net income. An income-tax return does not reflect the true financial condition of the taxpayer. Again, an income-tax return will not show the wage scale, in which the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] displayed such an interest on Thursday of last week. And I agree fully with him that the wage scale is, indeed, a truly important factor in tariff making in order that adequate protection to American labor may be made certain.

Again, an income-tax return filed by a corporation engaged in various activities can not be broken down to show the profits and losses with respect to each of the activities. Witnesses testified before the Finance Committee that certain of their products were manufactured at a loss, but their general business was profitable. Only a very thorough and exhaustive audit will reveal the gains derived or the losses sustained in each particular line. Furthermore, the published income statements of corporations provide the latest available information, which it would seem the Senator from North Carolina would be interested in obtaining, whereas the income-tax returns are available only for past years, and many of them are in the process of audit and are not readily available even for the year 1927.

With the very information the Senator says he is seeking readily available, in convenient and reliable form, with no suggestion prior to the present time that an exhaustive analysis of income-tax returns be made, requiring several months of study and producing results of little or no use, it must be obvious that the proponents and supporters of the resolution are not seeking information which will guide their action upon the pending bill. What, then, are the purposes of the resolution? What are the motives which actuated the Senator from North Carolina in proposing the resolution? Why will certain Senators support the resolution?

Obviously I have no means of ascertaining the answers to these questions. I can do no more than analyze and point out the possibilities. The answer must be found in one or a combination of two or more of these possibilities.

Can it be possible that the advocates are attempting to raise again the issue of income-tax publicity? I can not bring myself to this conclusion. This issue was most effectively and, I believe, finally disposed of during the enactment of the revenue act of 1926. The storm of protest over the provisions written into the revenue act of 1924 swept away all support from the proponents of publicity. The provision was promptly repealed. The Senator from North Carolina himself and most of his colleagues on the Democratic side voted in favor of its repeal. Manufacturers, producers, newspaper owners, professional men—in fact, all classes of taxpayers—united in one of the most remarkable protests over witnessed. They would not permit their private affairs to be exposed to their competitors, to contribution solicitors, to "tax hounds," and to the curious. Unless my memory serves me most incorrectly, Mr. President, I believe that the most earnest advocates of income-tax publicity abandoned their issue during the enactment of both the revenue act of 1926 and the revenue act of 1928. It is true that many of them, including the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], have advocated a substitute proposal. But I believe that they have dropped completely and forever any advocacy of publishing the names of individual taxpayers and the amount of taxes paid by them. For example, permit me to quote a statement made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] during the Finance Committee hearings on the revenue act of 1926:

> I think that Congress and everyone have gotten very much confused by a discussion of publicity of records. It is not publicity of records we need; it is accessibility of records; and if these records were accessible to proper committees of Congress I doubt if there would be much need for anything further; but we talk about publicity, and it is not publicity we want; it is accessibility.

No, Mr. President, I can not believe that the Senator from North Carolina and those cooperating with him have knowingly permitted themselves to become advocates of income-tax publicity.

And yet, Mr. President, this must be one of the consequent results. Certainly if the committee gets the information it will be expected that they supply it to the Senate. The information being in the hands of the Senate, it will be promptly spread throughout the country. But let me point out to those few who may even still support income-tax publicity that, in addition to all other objections, this proposal will most certainly be met with a most serious but sound criticism. Under the publicity provision of the 1924 revenue act it was at least true that all taxpayers were treated the same. If the pending resolution is adopted, however, the returns of only a few taxpayers will be published. Only a few will be singled out and their business affairs advertised. In fact, I wonder whether a long-desired opportunity to harass and pillory a few individual taxpayers has not lead some of the supporters of this resolution into their present position. Is it fair, Mr. President, to single out a comparatively few taxpayers and publish the information they have given in confidence to the officials of the Government engaged in determining their tax liabilities? Do we want to give out data which admittedly will be misunderstood by the public? Do we want to spread information which admittedly does not correctly reflect the financial condition of the few individuals singled out for harassment? No, Mr. President. I firmly believe that our taxpayers will insist, properly and with no uncertain voice, upon the privilege of contributing to the needed revenues of our Government without subjecting their private business affairs to the prying scrutiny of their competitors and those prompted by ulterior motives.

But perhaps, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina and those who have joined with him will deny that they are attempting to raise anew the issue of income-tax publicity. Perhaps they will disclaim all desire to harass a few individual taxpayers. But can they, Mr. President, deny that they are seeking to delay indefinitely, and in all probability prevent, the final enactment of the pending bill?

Mr. President, it is my firm opinion that a minimum of two months will be required to assemble in Washington the returns designated by the minority of the committee and permit their examination by the committee. But, Mr. President, the examination of a few designated returns will not be sufficient. The rates in this bill are not based upon the requirements of a few individual manufacturers or producers. If we are going into the question of profits and losses as shown by income-tax returns, it will be necessary for us to consider the returns of every corporation engaged in the particular industry. And that, Mr. President, will require several months of constant work. Does anyone honestly believe that an examination of a few of the returns of any particular industry adequately reflects the condition of that industry? For example, statistics of income for 1926 show a grand total of 455,320 corporations filing returns. Of that number, 258,134, or 56.69 per cent, showed taxable net income, while 197,186, or 43.31 per cent, showed losses. Of the 193,244 manufacturing corporations filing returns for 1926, 55,094 showed taxable net income, while 58,150, or 40.91 per cent, showed losses. If the Senator selects a dozen returns to examine, he is neglecting entirely the remaining 55,000, which showed a net income and completely disregards the 38,000, which showed losses.

I do not believe that I need mention the confusion which will be caused in the administration of the revenue laws. I can not ascertain the cost to the Government resulting from the running of the statute of limitations, directly attributable to the delay, during the period the returns are in the hands of this committee. Confusion and delay must result. And for what purpose, Mr. President? I believe firmly for the purpose of bringing about, through the consequent delay, the ultimate defeat of the pending bill.

The price to be paid is certain. The consequences are certain. The establishment of the principle of income-tax publicity; the opportunity to attempt to harass a few individual taxpayers; prolonged and indefinite delay in the consideration of the bill—these are the real issues presented by the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina. A vote for the resolution can only be accepted as a vote for each of these propositions, as an indorsement of all of them. With each Senator fully appreciating this, and with the public well aware of the meaning of a vote for the resolution, I am most willing to hasten a vote upon it.

I believe, Mr. President, I will take the time of the Senate to call attention to some of the corporations and firms which give monthly and quarterly reports of their business, which are published. First, I will take the industrial corporations engaged in the manufacture of food, as follows:

Beechnut Packing, Certo, Corn Products Refining, Cushman's Sons, Cuyamel Fruit, Fleischmann, General Baking, General Foods (former Postum Co.), Hershey Chocolate, George Hormel, Adolph Gobel, Kraft-Phenix Cheese, Loft (Inc.), National Biscuit, Penick & Ford, Pet Milk, United Biscuit, Pacific Coast Biscuit, Western Dairy.

Tobacco: Alles & Fisher, Bayuk Cigar, Congress Cigar, Consolidated Cigar, Otto Eisenlohr, General Cigar.

Chemicals: Air Reduction, By-Products Coke, Columbian Carbon, Commercial Solvents, Coty, Hercules Powder, MacAndrews & Forbes, Mathieson Alkali Works, Monsanto Chemical Works, Novadel-Agene, Texas Gulf Sulphur, Union Carbide & Carbon, United Carbon, V. Vivaudou, Walgren, Westvaco Chlorine Products.

I will next mention a few of the corporations engaged in the metal industry——

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the third name from the last in the first group which the Senator read? I did not catch it.

Mr. SMOOT. I presume the Senator refers to the United Carbon Co.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask a question about the list the Senator is reading. It is nothing but a list of companies; it does not recite their profits or their earnings?

Mr. SMOOT. A statement of their earnings is published every quarter or in some cases monthly.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the committee have that information before them?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we did not.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the committee figure what the difference in the production at home and abroad would be, taking into consideration the profits of the companies he has mentioned?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I may say that this is the first time in making a tariff bill since I have been a member of the committee that the large manufacturers of the United States, such as the United States Steel Corporation, have not appeared before the committee.

Mr. BROOKHART. They got some rates, however; did they not?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a minute; let me finish the statement. I say that this is the first time that has happened; and I refer to them only because the same thing applies to the other mass producers in the United States. Mass production in the United States has changed the whole situation in our country. The ones that were appealing to the committees—not only the Finance Committee but, judging from the hearings, to the Ways and Means Committee of the House—were the smaller manufacturers of this country.

We did not have any Du Ponts appear before us. We know very well that they have made a great deal of money—a great deal of it, Mr. President; millions of dollars. There is no question about that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. Did the Senator reduce their tariff rates in proportion to their increased profits?

Mr. SMOOT. If we had done that there would not be anybody else doing business in the United States. They would have all the business. In other words, the smaller manufacturers would go out of business.

Mr. BROOKHART. In other words, this tariff bill is framed on the theory that it makes no difference how great the profits are that are earned by these companies under its protection?

Mr. SMOOT. This tariff bill is not a piece of legislation that is framed with any one concern in mind. In making a tariff bill we have to take the industry of the United States as a whole. If I were writing a tariff bill for the United States Steel Corporation or the Du Ponts it would be quite a different bill than this.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to finish my statement.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. He stated that it was the small fellow that came before the Finance Committee and asked for increased rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; as a rule.

Mr. HARRISON. Are these rates based upon inefficient management and uneconomical location of industries in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I would not say that. I will say, however, that the great bulk of the manufacturing done in the United States is not done by the large concerns I have mentioned. The manufacturers are located in almost every State in the Union; and we have not tried in this bill, nor am I in favor of trying, to take perhaps one little concern in any one State and provide a duty sufficient to enable it to sell its goods profitably anywhere in the United States. That is not the policy of tariff making by the Republican Party. What we have tried to do is to protect the great bulk of the manufacturers of the United States. If the rates that were asked for were put into this bill, as the Senator knows, they would be a great deal higher than they are.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator to mean that if we have two groups of industries in this country, one of which is inefficiently managed and uneconomically located, while the other is efficiently managed, well organized, and economically located, the Senator in fixing these rates considers only the inefficient fellow and fixes the rates so that the efficiently managed concerns can get the benefit of them?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; we did not do that, nor did we consider the corporations with billions at their command, not only manufacturing goods and selling them in the United States, but exporting them, and growing every year more prosperous under existing law. I think, Mr. President, that so far as the present law is concerned these mass producers would not care whether we passed a tariff bill at all or not. The present law is sufficient for them; but we tried to take care of the efficient smaller manufacturers.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BROOKHART. How could the Senator get even an average cost of production without considering the profits of the big fellow?

Mr. SMOOT. As I say, we did not consider the profits of the big fellow. We did not consider what was necessary for him. If we had done that he could in the future have all the business.

Mr. SIMMONS and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I understand the Senator, his argument is that the big manufacturers, the key manufacturers in the different industries, did not come before the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The automobile manufacturers, the United States Steel Corporation, and so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. For instance, the Senator says the Du Ponts did not come before the committee, but that certain small corporations producing the same products as the Du Ponts under less favorable conditions, probably, both as to inefficiency of management and obsolete machinery, or corporations which from any cause are not as prosperous as the Du Ponts, did come before the committee. In other words, while Mr. du Pont remained away from the committee and made no request of it, these less prosperous concerns competing with him, if there is any competition in this country in such industries as that, manufacturing the same products, came before the committee, and this bill is framed upon the testimony that they presented as to their particular conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that they were not given all that they asked for.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the bill was based upon their representations of a lack of prosperity on their part. If, yielding to their pleadings and their demands, the committee decided to increase the rate in order to meet their situation of costly production, will not the Du Ponts or the higher-ups get the full value of the measure of increase accorded these less prosperous and more inefficiently managed corporations? And, therefore, if that is true, is not your bill based upon the rate that is necessary to protect the inefficient manufacturers in every line of industry in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, I can understand, if that is the policy of the committee, why the big, dominating industries of the country did not appear before the committee. It was to their interest that these men, who probably were more entitled to help than they, should appear, in view of the fact that whatever increases were allowed to the little fellows would inure equally to their benefit; and, therefore, through the efforts of these inefficient corporations before the committee, they might secure additional tariff protection which possibly would be denied to them if they should apply.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I deny that the bill is made upon the basis of inefficiency.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the statement the Senator has been making seems to me to be without force.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to finish a sentence, I shall be very much pleased, indeed. I deny that the bill is made upon the basis of protecting inefficiency. I have already stated the basis upon which the bill is framed; and the reasons for the amendments will come when we take up the individual amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. But, if the Senator will pardon me for just one question, did not the Senator say that the strongest men did not appear; that only the weak men in the industries appeared?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did not the Senator say that in substance?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I said that the mass producers were not interested, and the United States Steel Corporation did not appear, nor did the Du Ponts appear. That is what I said; but I did say that the bill was based upon the absolute requirements of the efficient manufacturers here who are not engaged in mass production. That is what I said.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, Mr. President, if that was the idea, if the bill is based absolutely upon the requirements and necessities of the efficiently managed concerns, after these inefficiently managed and weak and unprosperous concerns came before the committee why did not the committee summon these large corporations, these dominating and controlling corporations, these price-fixing corporations, in order to get the information that might be needed?

Mr. SMOOT. What did we want them for?

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, to ascertain how much protection they were entitled to, if your purpose was to protect only the efficiently managed corporations and industries of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no need of discussing the question along that line. I have stated time and time again the principle upon which the bill was framed, and there is no need of discussing it any further. The Senator seems to hark back repeatedly to the basis upon which we arrived at these rates. I have stated what the basis was. We have written into this bill rates that will at least partially assure the American manufacturer the American market.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator, then, a direct question. Was the bill framed with a view to giving protection to the efficiently managed industries of this country, or was it framed with a view to giving sufficient protection to the inefficiently managed industries?

Mr. SMOOT. It was framed, as I have said half a dozen times, to give protection to the efficient manufacturers in the United States, not including, however, the mass producers. I do not know how I can state it more clearly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, how can you exclude the mass producers?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what they want. We could exclude them in this way: They might want a lower rate, so that they could kill all competition; and if they killed all competition, then they would charge the American people whatever price they saw fit.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of what their ultimate and ulterior design might be along that line, whatever protection is granted to the efficient and well-managed concern which did appear and ask for it will also accrue to the efficient mass producer who did not appear, will it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It may and it may not. It all depends upon whether or not they take advantage of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true of all of them.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. It is quite true, is it not, that most of these manufacturers are in so-called institutes or associations, and understand each other pretty well?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not so understand, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true with reference to the steel industry, is it not? They have their institute; and is it not a fact that the representative of the steel interests before the committee got exactly what he asked for on structural steel?

Mr. SMOOT. There was no one there for the Steel Institute.

Mr. HARRISON. Before the Ways and Means Committee of the House the representative of the Steel Institute asked for an increase on structural steel, and did he not get it in the Senate bill? He did not have to appear before the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what he asked for. I can not say as to that. He did not appear before the Finance Committee.

Mr. HARRISON. But there was an increase on structural steel?

Mr. SMOOT. He did not appear before the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Perhaps he thought it was not necessary to appear before the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Since the Senator is referring to these corporations, I want to call his attention to the fact that the statistics of income for 1926 show a grand total of 455,320 corporations filing returns. Of that number 258,134, or 56.69 per cent, showed taxable net income, while 197,186, or 43.31 per cent, showed losses.

Those are the corporations which filed their returns in the United States in 1926. In other words, the returns of 43.31 per cent of the manufacturers showed absolute losses for that year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is reading a list of the corporations which announce through the daily press every three months the amount of their profits or losses. That is not official information, it is not information any Senator can obtain unless either he or some one for him goes around to all the newspaper offices to get newspapers on the day when the corporations make their reports for publication and obtains the information. Does the Senator contend that the Senate of the United States and the Finance Committee ought to rely upon these quarterly publications which appear in the daily press from day to day for information upon which to base a tariff law?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was speaking of the publicity of tax returns, and the Senator was not here when I covered that matter. I can only repeat what I have said before.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I was here.

Mr. SMOOT. Then there is no need of my saying anything further than what I have already said.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the Senator understands that the provision now in the law which authorizes the committee to have access to these reports was inserted for the very purpose sought to be carried out by the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina. It was contemplated that Senate committees might need this information for the very purpose of determining the merits of a contention on the part of any industry that they needed greater protection, or for the purpose of obtaining that information in connection with an internal revenue tax law. Does the Senator contend that the publication of quarterly reports in the daily press is a fair substitute for the information sought by the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, which was contemplated by the Congress when it put this provision in the act?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when a statement is published, and sworn to by the officers of a company, I think we get more information out of it than out of a tax return, and I have already given my reasons for that statement.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator said that 43 per cent of the corporations in the United States were not prosperous.

Mr. SMOOT. Had losses.

Mr. BROOKHART. The loss amounted to about $2,000,000,000 a year, did it not?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures here as to the amount of the loss.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is considerable of an impeachment of the Republican prosperity we hear so much about, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; the country, notwithstanding that, has been the most prosperous country in the world.

Mr. BROOKHART. That applies to those engaged in mass production, and they did not appear before the committee at all, as I understand the Senator. In the advanced-rate case the prosperous railroads did not appear, either. They sent in those that were not prosperous and attempted to raise the whole rate structure and then to take the benefit of it themselves. Is that not what was done in his case?

Mr. SMOOT. That is an entirely different proposition; the hauling by one road from here to Chicago is exactly the same as hauling by another, as far as rates are concerned. The class of goods made by one concern is quite different from that made by another.

Mr. BROOKHART. Nevertheless the Great Western Railroad was never quite as prosperous as the North Western, but the Great Western was the one that appeared at the hearing to prove the necessity for higher rates.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think the commission took just what the Great Western stated? They investigated every railroad, whether they appeared or did not appear.

Mr. BROOKHART. But the Senator admits that he has not investigated the big mass producers in making up this tariff bill. That is the point I was making.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; they never appeared before the committee.

Mr. President, I shall not read further from the list of the companies referred to, and I have nothing more to say upon this publicity question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] to the resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into any prolonged discussion of this resolution.

The argument which the Senator from Utah has made is one of the most remarkable I have heard in this Chamber for many years, remarkable for its inconsistencies as well as remarkable for its unsoundness.

The Senator contends that industries in this country as a whole are very, very prosperous, enjoying an unusual degree of prosperity, but that in these various industries there are what we might call "lame ducks," that there are small corporations which are not prospering, which are making no profits, which are sustaining losses. Probably their lack of ability to keep up with the procession is due to mismanagement, or to obsolete machinery, or to inefficiency of some sort.

These were the people, the Senator said, who came and demanded the increases in the several schedules. The prosperous portion of the corporations representing this industry did not appear. The conclusion is inevitable from the argument of the Senator, therefore, that the bill is framed so as to allow a sufficient degree of protection to place these unprosperous and these badly managed corporations upon a basis of competition with the foreigner, not only upon a basis of competition with him but to make the rates against the foreigner practically prohibitive in many instances, so that those corporations may have no foreign competition to meet, and may prosper no matter how inefficient and blundering their management may be.

That policy, if pursued in this bill, would condemn it in the estimation of the intelligent people of this country, if there were not other things in it to condemn it. That proposition involves the proposition of penalizing the American consumers by the imposition of tariff taxes for the purpose of protecting the inefficient, badly managed corporations of this country. As we have understood heretofore, in measuring the spread between the cost of production here and the cost abroad for the purpose of ascertaining how much protection an industry was entitled to, we measured it with reference to the efficiently managed institutions or corporations in the United States, compared with like efficiently managed corporations in other countries. If that has not been the basis, then I have misunderstood the basis of computation, wherever there has been an attempt—and I will admit that the Republican Party has very seldom made an attempt—to measure duties according to the cost of production.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to correct a statement of the Senator, one I have corrected twice or three times before. I never stated that these rates were based upon inefficient manufacture.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said the evidence received by the committee upon which they made the rates was obtained from these little fellows, and the Senator stressed the fact that they were in many instances unprosperous and sustaining losses instead of making profits.

Mr. SMOOT. I have corrected that three or four times, and I will not say anything further in regard to the matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator can not correct me so as to change my position, when my position, I am sure, is absolutely sound. But I do not care to go into that phase of the matter at present.

It will be shown, however, before we get through with this discussion that that was practically the theory upon which rates were fixed and established in this bill; that is, according to the mismanaged and inefficient corporations enough protection to enable them to prosper under bad management.

The Senator states that the big corporations, the mass producers, the keen men in the industries, did not appear. Why should they have appeared? Their cause was pleaded by the small corporations. They were sufficiently shrewd to understand that if these unprosperous corporations could make an impression upon the committee, and could secure from it rates sufficient to protect them, those increases would inure to their benefit, and therefore I suspect that they very shrewdly abstained from appearing before the committee, and allowed the committee to act upon the representations and the demands and the needs of these weaker and badly managed corporations. That is aside from the resolution now pending, however, and that question will be thoroughly threshed out as we go along, analyzed, exposed, and illustrated, and the arguments will be presented.

The resolution I have introduced is for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of procuring from official sources information that would be helpful to the Senate in determining the question of whether the industries of this country are entitled to the increases which they demand.

If the industries of this country are prosperous under the present tariff law, if they are making profits, not small profits but large profits, some of them enormous profits, they are not entitled to the relief. And the Senate is entitled to the information upon which we can reach a just determination of this question.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina will go to the calendar and the unfinished business, Senate Joint Resolution 53, to create a joint congressional committee relative to prohibition enforcement, is before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose it is about the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not about the resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I wish to make a motion that the Senate continue the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 2667, the tariff bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the Senator makes that motion will he permit an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The resolution which has been under consideration is a matter interwoven with the tariff discussion. Will not the Senator from Utah permit the resolution to remain before the Senate until its consideration is concluded? It is intimately related to the tariff bill. Would there be any objection to asking unanimous consent, after the Senator's motion prevails, that the resolution be laid temporarily before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to get the tariff bill before the Senate and I want to have that measure considered.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. The Chair stated that the Senator from North Carolina had the floor, and he made a motion. That motion is the question that is now pending and not the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand that the Senator from North Carolina had made a motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said I was going to make the motion.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from North Carolina has the floor some other Senator can not take him off the floor by getting up and making a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from North Carolina yielded to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not yield to the Senator from Utah for the purpose of cutting off my motion.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator yielded to me, and I made a motion.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from North Carolina expressly stated that he was going to make a motion when the Senator from Utah interrupted and said he wanted to make a motion.

Mr. SMOOT. And I made it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator could not do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from North Carolina has the floor. He did not lose the floor at 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. The unfinished business is now before the Senate, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is now before the Senate, and the Senator from North Carolina has the floor to make any motion he sees fit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the further consideration of Senate Resolution 108.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will permit me, I recognize that the unfinished business can not stay before the Senate in the face of the tariff bill or any matter connected with tariff legislation. I believe that the joint resolution which is now the unfinished business can be passed by unanimous consent. However, I am not going to ask that that be done to-day because of the absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who asked for certain information the other day. I have acquired that information, but the Senator from Virginia is necessarily absent to-day. Under those circumstances I would not ask unanimous consent for the passage of the joint resolution which is now the unfinished business, but I do ask, if I allow some other resolution or bill to be made the unfinished business without discussion, that the fact that the tariff bill is pending be not held to be an objection or a ground for objection to a request for unanimous consent to pass the joint resolution when the Senator from Virginia is present. With that statement, I am not going to resist the motion to take up either the tariff bill or the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 108.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	George	La Follette	Shortridge
Ashurst	Gillett	McKellar	Simmons
Barkley	Glenn	McMaster	Smoot
Bingham	Goff	McNary	Steck
Black	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Stelwer
Blaine	Gould	Moses	Swanson
Blease	Greene	Norris	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Hale	Nye	Thomas, Okla.
Brock	Harris	Overman	Townsend
Brookhart	Harrison	Patterson	Trammell
Broussard	Hastings	Phipps	Tydings
Capper	Hatfield	Pine	Vandenberg
Connally	Hayden	Pittman	Wagner
Couzens	Hebert	Ransdell	Walcott
Dale	Heflin	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Deneen	Howell	Robinson, Ark.	Walsh, Mont.
Dill	Jones	Robinson, Ind.	Warren
Edge	Kean	Sackett	Waterman
Fess	Keyes	Schall	Watson
Fletcher	King	Sheppard	Wheeler

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is absent from the Senate on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 108.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had intended to press the motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 108, but I will withhold it and yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] for the purpose of asking that the tariff bill be laid before the Senate and made the unfinished business, with the understanding that when that is done the tariff bill will be temporarily laid aside for the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Is it understood that when the tariff bill is made the unfinished business it will be laid aside, or will we have to vote to lay it aside?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh no; not at all.

Mr. BORAH. Are we going to get unanimous consent to do it? I understand Senators are going to insist upon a vote as to whether or not we will lay aside the tariff bill after it has been made the unfinished business.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. WATSON. We are not going to ask for a vote on that matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have said I would withhold my motion upon the understanding and agreement that if the tariff bill is made the unfinished business, the chairman of the Finance Committee the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will ask that it be temporarily laid aside at that time for the purpose of proceeding with the further consideration of my resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's motion is now pending to proceed to the consideration of his resolution.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I agreed to withhold it.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the Senator withdraws his motion and a motion is then made to take up the tariff bill and it is made the unfinished business. Then if it is temporarily laid aside for that purpose and we proceed to the further consideration of the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina but do not dispose of it to-day or to-morrow, he then has himself confronted with the same condition of affairs as now exists, and he will have to get unanimous consent again to lay aside the unfinished business. Why does he not press his motion now? Why not vote on that motion first? If there is anything in the purpose of the resolution it ought to be passed before we take up the tariff bill, because the information asked for in the resolution is needed in the consideration of that bill.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. I understand this is a good-faith proposition all around. In the orderly course of procedure the tariff bill should be made the unfinished business. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] said that he would ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside temporarily and we will consent then to take up the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina. That is entirely proper. I trust that we may get a vote on the resolution to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. That means, as I understand it, that the tariff bill will not be called up again until the resolution is acted upon.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator mean if it should take a week or two weeks?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; I mean only to-day and to-morrow. I have no idea that we will run beyond to-day in the discussion and disposition of the resolution.

Mr. WATSON. Neither have I, and I sincerely trust, inasmuch as the whole proposition we have indulged in is in good faith, that we may get a vote on the Senator's resolution this day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina withdraw his motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amedments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read the motion which I intend to propose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That in the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2667) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, to protect American labor, and for other purposes, the Senate shall first proceed to consider the provisions of Titles III and IV of the bill (which contain the special and administrative provisions) and shall complete such consideration in the Committee of the Whole before considering in the Committee of the Whole Titles I and II of the bill (which contain the dutiable and free lists); and

That during the consideration in the Committee of the Whole of Titles III and IV the Senate shall first consider section by section all proposed committee amendments, and then section by section all other proposed amendments.

INCOME-TAX AND CAPITAL-STOCK-TAX RETURNS

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate resume consideration of Senate Resolution 108.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 108) submitted by Mr. SIMMONS on the 5th instant, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BLAINE.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, at the time the morning hour expired at 2 o'clock I was arguing that the information desired in the resolution is information manifestly of great value in determining whether the increases made in the House bill and in the Senate committee amendments were necessary or justified.

It is true, Mr. President, that some of the great corporations do make statements at regular intervals, and they are published, as stated by the Senator from Utah; but I doubt very much whether there are three Senators in this body who read those statements or who have them in their possession.

Furthermore, the information thus given is not supplied under oath and is not duly verified.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. McMASTER. In reading the resolution as offered by the Senator from North Carolina I find that the information for which he asks in the resolution in most cases is not contained in the published statements of corporations. It does not make any difference how many such statements may be published the information desired is not contained in them, because the Senator asks, so far as practicable, that the profits of the various departments of a business be segregated—that is the point of value in the resolution—in order that we may know the profit or loss on account of a particular branch of the business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that such information has never been contained in income-tax returns. Corporations in their returns do not give the amount of gains which they make in each department. They simply say, "This is a profit and this is a loss."

Mr. SIMMONS. Whatever the income-tax returns may show, Mr. President, they are what we ask for and nothing more.

There may be some publications covering some lines of industry by certain corporations engaged in those lines of industry, but there is no general publication of the data which we are seeking to obtain through the income-tax returns. Those returns apply not only to the great mass producers in this country but they also apply to the smaller producers; they apply equally to that class of producers who the Senator says are not prosperous and who are here asking for increases in tariff rates. What we desire and what we need, Mr. President, in the consideration of the pending bill and the amendments to it, is information that relates to every one of these schedules that are challenged and are in controversy; and the only place where we can get that information is from the Treasury Department. The fact that we can get a little fragmentary information upon the subject from a few reports which are made by corporations whose stock is listed on the stock market is no argument at all against the furnishing by the department of the information which is sought.

But why, I ask, is the Senator from Utah and those in the opposition, if others may be following him, so much concerned about the Senate getting this information for its guidance, in face of the fact that the Senator says so much of it is already public property and is contained in pamphlets and publications that are open to the inspection of anybody who happens to be interested in stock-exchange reports or a stockholder in the institutions issuing financial and business statements? The opposition of the Senator is based, Mr. President—he talks about my motives—upon the manifest fact that the data which may be elicited by the resolution, if adopted, will militate against and in some instances confound the Senator and his colleagues when the rates to which this information will apply are under discussion in the Senate.

I can not understand why anybody should desire to conceal from the Senate such information when it is engaged in the consideration of a measure which, if it shall be enacted, will impose upon the people of this country taxes to the amount of several hundred million, or, indeed, several billion dollars, or should object to the Senate having the advantage of every available bit of information that can be secured from the departments of the Government.

Mr. President, I recognize that some time ago the Senate voted quite strongly against publishing tax returns, but when we cast that vote we recognized the fact that the Congress or its committees might need information contained in those returns; and in order that such information might not be padlocked and concealed in connection with that very legislation repealing the publicity provision, we incorporated an exception; we embodied in the provision a clause to the effect that any committee of either House of Congress might at any time and in its own discretion apply for those returns for its information in connection with legislation pending before it; and it provided that such committee might, in its discretion, transmit that information to the Congress of the United States for its enlightenment in the consideration of legislation. But for that exception, which allowed the lawmaking body of this country to have open access to income-tax returns and to make use of them in connection with legislation, we could not have repealed the publicity provision of the former act. We are now seeking to exercise this right that was reserved to us in express terms in the act which repealed the publicity provision of the former law.

I do not wish to pry, Mr. President, into the private business of the corporations of this country. The Senate and the House said that no private citizen should be permitted to do that—and it was right—but the Senate said that this information should not be concealed from the Congress; and the first Senator or Representative who has ever insisted that the Congress was not entitled to the benefit of this information and to get it in the way provided in the law is the Senator from Utah. I had not supposed there would be any opposition to the resolution presented by me; I had supposed it was so apparent that this information would be useful and valuable that no Senator would make a question about the exercise by the Senate of its right under the law to ask for it.

Mr. President, I did not intend to take up any time of the Senate in the discussion of the resolution; certainly I had no purpose of discussing it in detail. I understand that there are others who do desire to discuss it, and I shall therefore content myself with what I have said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allen	George	La Follette	Shortridge
Ashurst	Gillett	McKellar	Simmons
Barkley	Glenn	McMaster	Smoot
Bingham	Goff	McNary	Steck

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not intend to take very much of the time of the Senate in discussing the amendment I have proposed. I feel, however, that the information sought to be obtained under the amendment is very essential in the consideration of the tariff bill.

Members will observe that a part of the title of the bill provides that one of its purposes is to protect American labor. I know of no information that is available, excepting general information based upon certain theoretical calculations, that specifically informs the country of the wages paid in industry.

It is true that we have statistical information giving the amount of wage per week, per hour, per month, or upon some basis of that character; but we have no information, aside from deductions which we can make, giving the wage per unit of production.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not familiar with the extent to which these returns disclose the amount of wages paid. Do these corporate returns show the number of employees in a given year; and the amount of wages paid per annum?

Mr. BLAINE. Answering the Senator, I might suggest that if he were to take a Federal income-tax return and analyze it, it would take but a moment, and he would at once ascertain the ratio of wage to production.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But not the amount of wage per person?

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no. That information is readily available, however.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the percentage to which labor enters into the cost of producing a product is shown?

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator for the information. I thought the Senator was trying to get information for the Senate as to the amount of wages paid per capita in each of these industries.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That would be helpful, of course.

Mr. BLAINE. That would be helpful if we could obtain it; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the specific items referred to in the amendment which I have proposed to the resolution submitted by the Senator from North Carolina. The amendment is in the language of the income tax law, and it is in the language used in the income-tax returns of corporations, individuals, or copartnerships.

I have in my hand an income-tax return for a corporation. I am going to translate the amendment into specific terms according to the information I have respecting a specific corporation, giving the exact amount of each item as returned by that corporation.

This corporation which I have in mind is a corporation engaged in the manufacture of cement. It operates, as I understand, three or four cement factories. That is, this corporation is one of a group that operates three or four cement factories, and is a part of that group. Its corporate stock stands as three-quarters of a million to one and three-quarters million in reference to the whole group. That company, for its 1928 income-tax return, returned gross sales from trading or manufacturing, less returns and allowances—using the exact language incorporated in the amendment—of $1,816,777.65; its inventory at the close of the preceding year—I will not give the exact figures, or the figures at all; I am just outlining this particular corporation—the inventory at the close of the preceding year as required by the amendment, the merchandise bought for sale, and the cost of manufacturing or otherwise producing goods, which is made up of two items taken from Schedule A of the Federal income-tax return.

Now, understand I am not taking these figures from the Federal income-tax return, but I am taking the figures as they no doubt were returned to the Internal Revenue Department. The cost of manufacturing or otherwise producing the goods is made up of two items—one item, $121,927.35, as the cost of labor. The gross sales of this company are $1,816,000, in round numbers. The cost of labor is $121,927. It is easy for any Member of this body to ascertain that there is no justification for a tariff on cement under the pretense that it is going to protect the American laborer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the case illustrated by the Senator, what per cent of the production is labor's portion of the cost of production?

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, it is very small—$121,000, in round numbers, as compared to $1,816,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. REED. How would the Senator find the labor cost of producing the rock and the other raw materials that went into that cement?

Mr. BLAINE. All of that cost is in the return of this corporation, and I assume in the returns of all cement companies.

Mr. REED. Do they produce all of their own raw materials?

Mr. BLAINE. I have the schedules here, nine pages, which include the clay pit, the limestone handling, the slurry department, clinker, finishing department, mill overhead, the bridge and dock, and the coal preparing. I think that is all.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to tell us that in order to produce over a million dollars' worth of cement, beginning with the raw materials, only $130,000 worth of labor was engaged?

Mr. BLAINE. One hundred and twenty-one thousand, nine hundred and twenty-seven dollars and thirty-five cents, according to the schedule filed by this particular cement company.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator must be reading it wrongly.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; I am not.

Mr. REED. I do not mean that he is not reading correctly what is there, but I think he must be interpreting it wrongly.

Mr. BLAINE. I think not. I have the cost of manufacturing, the operating labor cost, the operating supplies; I can give every detail if the Senate desires it; but it is not essential for my purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There are a large number of so-called cement companies that only distribute cement. Their item of labor would be very small. There are other cement companies that produce or manufacture cement. Is the company to which the Senator has referred a producer, a manufacturer, or simply a distributing cement company?

Mr. BLAINE. It is a producer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand it owns its own clay beds. I have all the details of that particular item if the Senator desires to have them.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is not necessary to give them, so far as I am concerned; but I wanted to make that distinction between the distributing cement company and the manufacturer from the raw product.

Mr. BLAINE. Another important item is the compensation of officers—$46,500 for the year—and another item is the net income of $30,968.41.

This is a very close corporation. Here is an organization with $1,800,000 of output, with a taxable income of only $30,968.41, but the officers' salaries amount to $46,500. Thirty-three and one-third per cent more is paid to the officers than is paid in profits as a net taxable income.

One of the reasons for my offering the amendment to the resolution is to have the Senate advised specifically whether or not these close corporations may continue to pay their officers practically the entire income, and then come before the Senate of the United States and ask for an increase of tariff on the ground that they are not making any money. I do not claim that this company is asking for tariff increases. I do contend that the Senate ought to be informed as to the salaries of its officers.

There is another company to which I want to refer. This is a silk company. I think one slight error was made in the colloquy between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Carolina. I will not endeavor to interpret the meaning of what the Senator from Utah said, but in the silk industry, as I understand it, the only silk manufacturing company representatives of which testified before the committee was perhaps the most prosperous of all the companies engaged in the manufacture of silk fabrics. I understand that all of the other silk manufacturing companies, with scarcely a single exception, asked the committee not to change the tariff rates on silk. Yet we have placed before us a bill which makes an enormous increase in the tariff on silks.

Take, for instance, spun silk yarn. It is increased from 44.71 to 49.24; and I am now translating the rates according to the report of the Tariff Commission.

The woven fabrics, the broad silks, Jacquard-figured, are increased from 55 to 65.

The silk pile fabrics, including pile ribbon and articles of such a nature, are increased from 60 to 68.70.

Silk ribbons, with Jacquard figures, are increased from 55 to 65.

Silk wearing apparel, not of lace and not embroidered, is increased from 60 to 65.

Then manufacturers of silk that are not specifically provided for are increased from 60 to 65.

Representatives of the company to which I have referred came before the Finance Committee, as I understand it, and made representation that that industry was suffering; that they needed this additional protection. Yet that company is a close corporation. Of its officers, every single officer except the treasurer has the same family name. The seven directors bear the same family name, they belong to the same family—fathers, brothers, nephews, uncles, perhaps wives and sisters.

Without the information as proposed to be requested by the amendment which I have offered, there is no one in the Senate, unless the information has been given privately to some Senator, who can give any information as to the exact financial condition of that company. Moody's Industrials does not publish that information. I have found no financial publication from which the information might be obtained, not even as to the rate of dividends it may be paying upon preferred stock.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Utah, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, if this company is included in the list the Senator from Utah furnished us this morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the list here, and really I do not recall.

Mr. BLAINE. The representatives of the company came before the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I supposed the Senator has reference to the Cheney Co. I am quite sure that is the company to which he referred.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is that company included in the list the Senator furnished?

Mr. SMOOT. I will find out. I have not the list before me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the list is valueless if the work of the committee was based upon information that came to the committee from companies not listed here.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What is the name of the company to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers?

Mr. BLAINE. I was not divulging the names of these companies for the very good reason that there may be those who want to deny accessibility to the income-tax returns of other companies. I do not believe I ought to point out by name any one or two companies.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. It is true, is it not, that Cheney Bros. is the only concern in the silk business that fits the description the Senator has just given?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know. I am not familiar enough with the silk manufactures to state. I am somewhat familiar with what was presented before the Finance Committee.

Mr. REED. If the Senator is referring to Cheney Bros., he is wrong when he states that they are not included in Moody's Manual.

Mr. BLAINE. Their names are there, yes, I presume.

Mr. REED. I find them in both Moody's and Poor's.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no doubt that their name is there, and the amount of the capital stock and the amount of their indebtedness, but there is no information in any publication that shows how much the officers of any of these companies are receiving, and I assert here that, so far as I have been able to ascertain, you can not find in any of the publications the information that is requested by the proposed amendment.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think he will find it in the income-tax returns?

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly, unless they have violated the law. I have here, as I suggested at the opening of my remarks, a corporation income-tax return. The first thing is the gross sales from trading or manufacturing less returns and allowances.

It is important to know that. It is important to know the cost of manufacturing, the two items, materials, and so forth, in one item, and cost of labor in another item. It is also important to know the compensation of officers. That is the twelfth item in the income-tax returns of corporations. The same information is given with respect to copartnerships. It is highly important to know the compensation of officers as specifically scheduled under Schedule C of the corporation income-tax return.

So that it is necessary to obtain all of the information necessary to ascertain the relative wage paid—that is, the wage as it stands in comparison to production, the unit of production. It is necessary to ascertain whether or not the profits of these companies are eaten up by huge salaries paid to individual officers. I think with respect to many of these older companies, companies like the Du Pont Co., companies in the steel industry, in the tanning industry, in the chemical industry, it will be found that in those industries a very few companies produce the greater portion of the output.

You will find in the chemical industry family corporations which have paid out enormous sums for salaries, no doubt, and which therefore may show a very small net income. You will find it in respect of the tanning companies, you will find it in the silk industry, you will find it in the woolen mills, you will find it in nearly all lines of industry. Those are the companies which propose to benefit by the increases proposed by the Finance Committee and by the House.

We ought to know these things. I see no reason why we should not know them. I see no reason why the Members of the Senate should not be put in full possession of those facts. I want a picture, as nearly as we can obtain one in the time we have to obtain it, of the exact financial status of a corporation. I am willing to vote for protection for industry that is suffering because of foreign competition. I am willing to vote for protection in order to protect the American workmen, but I want to know the facts before I cast my vote.

It is unfair for industry to come before the Congress of the United States and ask for an increased tariff on the claim of protecting American workmen unless the facts justify it.

I want to call attention to another case, in the woven wire cloth industry, where there has been a demand for an increased tariff. I do not know that I have the figures with me here to-day, but, as I recall, after the passage of the 1922 tariff act the weekly wage was about $53 for the workingman—and I am giving the figures now as my memory best serves me. That has been reduced to $33 a week; while, on the other hand, the imports have been greatly reduced and the exports have been greatly increased. Yet that industry bases its argument for an increased tariff or a retention of existing rates on the theory of protecting the American wage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is the Senator speaking about Fourdrinier wire, the woven cloth that is used in paper mills? I ask because the representatives of the workmen in that industry came before us and gave us a full statement of the difference in wages paid here and in the competing countries, and it was upon the information that came from the workmen themselves that I for one based my vote on that item. I thought they made a very strong case.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand, but there was no testimony showing the unit of production of the American workman compared with that of the foreign workman.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. That whole process was explained in great detail.

Mr. BLAINE. The whole process was explained in great detail; I am quite familiar with that. I have been in conference with workingmen, some of whom made those representations, but when it is discovered that the woven wire cloth industry as a whole is upon an exportable basis, then quite a different consideration enters into the case of the coarser mesh.

Mr. REED. Of course, we will have to discuss that item when we get to it.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly. I am not discussing it now.

Mr. President, if we are to be put in possession of information that is going to assist us in our deliberations, we ought to have these main items.

The Senator from Utah said it would postpone the consideration of the tariff bill. Let me advise the Senator from Utah that I have done a little bit of experimenting in this matter. Any ordinary typist just out of a business college will make up 10 reports per hour without overexertion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. A skilled typist will do much better. Those reports are simple. The report is all contained on the first page of the corporation income-tax return. The time required to make up the report of every corporation that has filed with the Internal Revenue Department will long have expired before the Senate gets to the consideration of Schedule 1, in my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to tell the Senator that the reports for 1927 are scattered all the way from San Francisco to New York, now under investigation by thousands of employees of the Treasury Department. It will perhaps be a year before they are all turned into the department. I do not know which ones they are, but I do know that they are scattered all over the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. How many thousand employees has the Treasury Department on this work?

Mr. SMOOT. A great many thousand.

Mr. BLAINE. A great many thousand?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. A letter to each one of those employees would bring back the information within a very few days if those employees have the corporation income-tax returns.

Mr. SMOOT. The returns are under investigation to see whether they are correct or not correct.

Mr. BLAINE. They do not need to send the income tax returns back. The Senator endeavors to assume that this is a monumental undertaking.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a monumental undertaking.

Mr. BLAINE. There are only eight items, all on the first page of the corporation income-tax return, specified in the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina and as modified by the amendment which I have proposed. It would require the divulging of no business secret. It would divulge no information that each Member of the Senate ought not to have. Some of the information, though very little of it, may be contained in the financial publications to which the Senator has referred, but not the essential information. If the income-tax returns are scattered all over the United States a mere letter to the possessor of those returns would bring the desired information. Certainly the possessors of those income-tax returns have brains and would recognize the requirements at once. It would only be necessary to point out the items, not by name, but by number, and if the public employees do not know what information is desired, they could be advised just to copy items 1, 2, a, b, c, e, 12, and 24. They are bright enough to know what is desired. Let the requests go to them wherever they may be located and even if they have from 10 to 100 of these income-tax returns in their possession, the information will be on its way to Washington in the course of 48 hours after the request.

I know that this is not a monumental undertaking. It is a simple clerical undertaking, no matter how widely the returns may be scattered. Obtain the returns now available in the city of Washington and let the other returns follow in due course of time. It is unfair to charge Senators with other than proper motives because they are asking for information when they are attempting to legislate on the peoples' business. There is no desire on the part of any Member of this body, I am sure, to undertake now the opening of the issue of the secrecy of income-tax returns. That is not the purpose. It can not be implied even by those who are most desirous of keeping hidden that information which the Members of the Senate ought to possess.

I trust that the amendment will be adopted. I am somewhat fearful that without the amendment we may have considerable dispute about the whole situation in the consideration of the bill, because I readily conceive that it is no difficult matter for those who want to sustain the tariff increases to bring in an array of corporations who have filed income-tax returns showing either no profit at all or a deficit. For instance, in the chemical schedule the most unjustifiable and exorbitant rates are imposed. Even the 1922 law in that respect is indefensible and yet under the chemical schedule it will be found that of those who are engaged in chemical production there are 3,788 that made a net return. They make a net return in the handsome sum of $358,966,530. It will be found also that there are 2,912 which either made no money at all or had a deficit of $45,034,965. Yet under the theory of the majority of the Finance Committee it is proposed to continue this highway robbery of the consuming public under the chemical schedule to benefit 3,788 corporations that made $358,000,000 and more.

Let us have the items of the 2,912 which make a return either of no income or a deficit of $45,000,000. Let us know their gross sales, their inventory at the close of the preceding year and the inventory at the end of the fiscal year, the merchandise bought for sale, the cost of manufacturing specifically, the labor cost, and the compensation of officers. Then we will be able to ascertain whether or not they are the companies entitled to increased tariff rates under the bill.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that it is very essential for the Senate to have the information requested not only in the resolution presented by the Senator from North Carolina but as well that proposed under my amendment.

I ask to have my amendment perfected just slightly. In the concluding paragraph of the amendment I have a provision reading as follows:

> And separately the total amount for each year returns are made as shown by the information filed, giving the determinable income of $1,500 or more per single person, or $3,500 or more per married person, classified as follows: (a) Salaries, (b) wages, exclusive of compensation of officers.

I do not believe that information is necessary if we have the information provided for in No. 2 (c), the salaries and wages, according to the corporation income-tax return, and the information requested down to the point I have indicated. That will give the information desired, even though the last few lines should be eliminated. Therefore I ask to modify my amendment by striking out of it the language after the word "officers" as I have just read it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator have the amendment reported as modified?

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that the amendment be reported as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as modified now reads as follows:

> Amend Senate Resolution 108 by inserting before the phrase "of the taxpayers" the following:
>
> "And a separate statement for each of said years of each of the following items:
>
> "Gross sales from trading or manufacturing, less goods returned, and any allowances or discounts from the sale price; and
> "(a) Inventory at beginning and close of each year.
>
> "(b) Merchandise bought for sale for each year.
> "(c) Cost of manufacturing or otherwise producing goods separately: (1) Salaries and wages, exclusive of compensation of officers; (2) material and supplies; (3) compensation of officers."

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to conclude very shortly. I know that the information required is not all the information we ought to have, but we must go begging. The attitude of the majority of the Finance Committee is such that I have no doubt they would deny us all the information. If the majority of the committee contend that the information which is requested does not indicate labor costs or give a true picture of profits or income, then I feel that it will be my duty to press the concurrent resolution which I introduced on the first day of the session. But I believe that the information which is requested will be of great value to the Members of this body in the study and deliberation of the tariff bill, and for that reason I trust that the amendment will be adopted and the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina, as amended, will be agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before we change the policy which we adopted several years ago, of keeping income-tax returns secret, I think we ought to stop to consider whether it is going to do us any good to change that policy in this regard. Perhaps the best way to test it is to take the very illustration given us a while ago by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. As the "horrible example" he told us about a cement company, which he did not name, which, of course, wanted a tariff on cement; he told us that it produced $1,816,000 worth of goods—at least, those were its gross sales—and that into that amount of product went $121,927.35 of labor—$1,816,000 of production at a labor cost of only $121,927.35. We all remember that. I was rather shocked by the statement, because I have seen too many cement plants in my own State to think that anybody anywhere could produce nearly $2,000,000 worth of cement at a labor cost of $121,000. So the Senator from Wisconsin very courteously has allowed me to see the paper from which he was reading, the corporation's tax return, which shows the items for that company. To begin with, I find that the item of labor that he gave us excludes, by its terms, all of the labor that went into the manufacture of the product; that is to say, the labor item which the Senator gave us does not include one penny of the labor cost of making the cement. The reason that it does not is that the item which he was reading was 22–A of the form "miscellaneous deductions," and the item itself is "salaries and wages not included in items 2, 12, or 14 above." Item 2 above gives the cost of manufacturing or otherwise producing the goods; so that the item the Senator read expressly excludes all manufacturing costs as well as the cost of labor.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Permit me to confess that I should have stated that item was taken from Schedule A, and that if I transposed it to 22 erroneously it was my mistake.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator got it from the wrong place in the form.

Mr. President, I can not quite see yet how any cement company ever produced its material at a cost of 6 per cent for labor. In this case only 6 per cent of the sale value of the goods was stated as being labor. I should think that the labor that went into the production of the fuel alone would amount to more than 6 per cent of the sale value of the cement produced. However, we can not debate it, because the analysis of the figures is not here.

The Senator then turned from that case to illustrate the case of wire cloth, and he stated that the Finance Committee had reported an increase in the tariff, although the exports were increasing, the imports diminishing, and the wages going down.

If the Senator would look at the Summary of Tariff Information, he would find that the imports, particularly of the fine-mesh wire, which comes from Germany and France, are about tenfold what they were in the year 1922; that is, so far as the unit of production goes, about which he asked, in the very fine mesh, which runs more than 90 wires to the inch; it is a slow, painstaking process which requires very highly skilled labor, and no man can tend more than one loom at a time. The unit of labor is exactly the same here as it is in France and in Germany, and the wages we are trying to maintain here are five times as much as the wages in France and in Germany. There is the reason for the action of the Finance Committee.

We did not stop to ask nor do we care whether some companies in that business are prosperous and whether some are not; that is not what the tariff is for; it is not to make prosperous companies more prosperous or to rescue companies from trouble. We did not stop to find out in most cases whether some of the various producers were more successful than others. What we were interested in was the wage contrast. The very theory of tariff writing goes back to that. There is no reason in the world for giving a company which is in financial straits a tariff in order to save it. We never thought of doing such a thing. If we put a tariff on, it was to endeavor to equalize the wage differential. Some of our producers, whose business is better run than that of others, probably make money; some of them, which are badly run, probably fail. It is not our business to correct that condition in the tariff law. If we have equalized the wage difference, we have done all we need to; and in every case we looked for that, except in the agricultural schedule.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. In analyzing wage schedules, does not the Senator from Pennsylvania realize that productivity is the essential factor in considering them?

Mr. REED. Yes; absolutely. Therefore we considered not merely the contrasting wages per hour but the wage cost per unit. If an American workman can produce twice as much as his German competitor and get twice the wages, there is nothing to protect, because the cost per unit is the same. The trouble is—and this is true of the two industries to which the Senator from Wisconsin referred, namely, wire and cement—that the competition comes from countries whose wage scale runs about from 20 to 25 per cent of ours. That is the whole purpose of the changes we have made. Doubtless we have made mistakes; anybody would in dealing with so many hundreds of items; but I believe there has been an honest desire to get the wage differential in each case.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question for information?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. As to every schedule with which the Finance Committee dealt and the rates of which it changed, the changes were made solely, of course, on information in reference to the difference in the cost of production abroad and at home; that is, the wage differential was largely taken into consideration in every case.

Mr. REED. That was the intention.

Mr. McMASTER. Is the information upon which the committee based their action all compiled in documentary form so that each Senator may have identically the same information which was had by the members of the Finance Committee?

Mr. REED. To the best of my belief, every vestige of information which we had will be found either in this book [indicating] or in the hearings which were taken before the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee. Those printed records are available.

Mr. McMASTER. So that in every case where the rates in schedules have been changed there are actual figures showing the difference in the cost of production in America and abroad?

Mr. REED. Wherever it was possible to get them; yes.

Mr. McMASTER. And where it was not possible to obtain them, then upon what did the committee base their action?

Mr. REED. We made our own calculations, basing them as far as we could on the rate of wages paid.

Mr. McMASTER. And that is all submitted in documents furnished the Senate?

Mr. REED. It is all here, of course. I ought perhaps to add that in each case while we were working over a schedule an expert of the Tariff Commission, who was a specialist on the particular schedule, would be there with us. Of course, his information is available to any Member of the Senate, as it was to us.

Mr. McMASTER. But his statements were not published by the committee?

Mr. REED. No; they were not printed.

Mr. McMASTER. So that there are really many conclusions which the Senate committee reached upon certain data which the Senate will not have in its possession unless it makes a special inquiry for such data?

Mr. REED. Not all. All that these experts did was to explain and enlarge somewhat the statements made in the Tariff Summary, which they themselves had written. The Senate has all the information we had, and ought to have the information to sustain every action of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has very properly stated that one of the elements in determining the difference of cost of production here and abroad is that of wages; but is it not a fact that the Tariff Commission has experienced very serious difficulty in determining in almost every instance the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and is not one of the reasons for the proposed change recommended by the majority the difficulty which the Tariff Commission has experienced in getting both from domestic industries and foreign industries any sound basis upon which to determine the difference in the cost of production?

Mr. REED. That is true; but the greatest difficulty has been experienced abroad. There are a number of countries to-day into which our Treasury agents are not permitted to go; they are not even allowed to enter the country. Practically always when they go to a country to investigate its production costs they are refused the information. The impression is general that the purpose of their being there is to secure facts upon which to base hostile action against the foreign manufacturers, and they are rebuffed in nearly every case. Frequently we have had to base our conclusions as to foreign production costs on the average invoices. That is all the information we could get.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Difficulties have also been experienced in getting the costs of the domestic producer. In the case of efficiently managed industries it has been possible for the Tariff Commission to obtain the cost of production, but from a large number of loosely and inefficiently managed concerns they have been helpless in getting any basis upon which to determine costs.

Mr. REED. It is quite true there are many industries in this country that do not know their own costs.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So, after all, when it comes to applying to a tariff duty the yardstick of the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, it is pretty largely a guess.

Mr. REED. It is a matter of judgment; yes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think it may be helpful to remind the Senate that some months ago, upon a suggestion or resolution offered by me, the Senate published what is known as Senate Document No. 9. That document was prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor under the direction of our very competent Secretary of Labor. In that document Senators will find what I think is authoritative information in respect of wages paid to skilled and unskilled labor in practically all the industries in practically every country in the world. I invite attention to the document, for I am sure Senators will find it very useful, containing as it does facts that may well be applied to a discussion of the tariff problem.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether that document contains any information revealing the respective efficiency of American labor as compared to foreign labor, so as to arrive at a fair conclusion of the net result?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I should not at this moment undertake to appraise the skill or the capacity of different laborers in the same line of industry in the different countries. I might, as a matter of patriotic pride, claim that ours are the more skillful.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not asking the Senator from California to make such an appraisal. I ask him whether the document referred to contains any information on that subject.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. No; I do not think it does in such express terms; but if I may trespass on the time of the Senator from Pennsylvania for a moment longer, if Senators turn to the document they will find that this information comes from official sources, gathered by our Government, and goes into a great many details, showing the hours of labor and the wages paid in agriculture and indeed in practically all branches of human industry; but as to whether there is a balancing or a comparing as to the output or capacity of the foreign laborer and the American, I do not recall that that point is developed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated a moment ago that there were a number of countries which had denied access to our Treasury officials for the purpose of ascertaining the costs of production. I know the Senator is always accurate and sure of his facts, but I think perhaps that statement may need some little qualification.

Quite recently I have talked with one of the Treasury officials, one whom I regard as most competent to speak of conditions in Europe; and the information which I derived from him was not quite in harmony with the statement made by the able Senator from Pennsylvania. It is true that in France—I do not care at the present moment to interrupt the Senator and go into the causes of the controversy—opportunity to investigate the activities of various producing companies was denied us; but I think that was quite in harmony with the views of our own Government, in view of the controversy which arose, which it is not necessary to consider now. I have been told with respect to the French situation, however, that some of those who were sent there had absolutely no knowledge of the French language. Just a short time before investigations had been made by officials of the Treasury Department. Then on the heels of those very comprehensive investigations came representatives of the Tariff Commission, and some objection was made to the further inquiry because, as stated, a comprehensive investigation had been made a very short time before. My information is that in Germany there is not the slightest difficulty in getting the facts. The same thing is true of Great Britain and other countries; and at the proper time, if that should become an issue, I think it can be stated that the broad generalization of my friend needs some qualification.

Mr. REED. When we get to that part of the bill we can take that up. I want to speak particularly about this resolution.

When we wrote the internal revenue law that allows the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee to get income-tax returns from the Treasury Department, we did that in order that those committees might be aided in framing legislation dealing with internal revenue, particularly the income tax. I do not think it was ever in our minds then that we would use the power which was then given to get returns for use as evidence in other matters, and yet that is what we are doing here. We are getting income-tax returns of producers to use as evidence in matters that have nothing to do with internal revenue, but a somewhat remote bearing on the question of the tariff.

A moment's thought will convince us that if we are going to do it intelligently, it is not enough to get the returns of one or two producers and draw conclusions from the prosperity, or lack of it, that is shown about them. We shall have to get the whole industry, to get the returns from all producers, before we shall begin to be able to draw any conclusion about the condition of that industry. By the time we have studied it all out for all of the hundreds of industries that are affected by this bill we shall not be able to call this the tariff law of 1929; it is more likely to be known as the tariff law of 1939.

Furthermore, the Senate ought to realize that every time we get from the Internal Revenue Bureau some of these original records that they have, we are making it impossible during the time we hold them for the bureau to take any action on those cases; and it is entirely conceivable that because of the statute of limitations the Government will lose far more by our withholding those returns from the people who ought to be working on them than the Government could possibly gain by any use that we would make of them.

Still another reason seems to me to urge that this resolution be not agreed to. After we get this return it does not tell us anything. We get, it is true, a statement of the labor that goes into the manufacture of the aggregate of the products of each taxpayer. There is no separation, however. The tax return makes no separation among products. You can not tell, in the case of a company or an individual making more than one thing, how much goes into the manufacture of each of those products. You can not tell how much of the salaries or wages shown in line 22 ought to be counted and how much ought not. The repairs of a factory are as much a cost of manufacture as anything else; and yet all the labor for repairs is separately shown, quite apart from item 2, the cost of manufacture. Whoever got up the income-tax return form certainly did not have it in mind that he was going to get out a good piece of cost accounting, because undoubtedly it does not show that. The tax return may be all right as a basis for assessing a tax; but as a way to appraise the success or failure of the business, the skill in operation, it gives you about as little evidence as anything could.

Now, still another reason:

It is wholly unnecessary to get this information in this way. I have on my desk Moody's and Poor's manuals of industrial corporations alone—no railroads or street railways or anything of that sort are in these—a very large volume, running to about 3,000 pages, in each case. Think of the time it is going to take the Treasury Department, even if it had that information, which it has not—think of the time and the wasted labor and the cost to the United States of duplicating that, which is all we would be doing!

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] asked this morning whether the Aluminum Co. of America was shown in these publications. I have looked, and find that it is shown in both cases.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not understand that the information requested by the resolution is at all the same as that contained in the report in Moody's Industrials.

Mr. REED. The information requested in the resolution is most of it unobtainable.

Mr. BLAINE. Permit me to suggest that the information in Moody's is largely for the information of stock exchanges and purchasers of bonds and stocks, and that sort of thing; but it includes scarcely any of the information that is requested by the resolution.

Mr. REED. The resolution asks the profits or losses of the taxpayer. It does give the profits or losses.

Mr. BLAINE. In very few instances.

Mr. REED. I have looked up only a few, but they were given in every case that I looked up.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know of any case where they are not given.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Pennsylvania must have misunderstood the inquiry I addressed to the Senator from Utah concerning the Aluminum Co. of America. Of course, I know that the Aluminum Co. of America is mentioned in Moody's and Poor's Industrials. That was not the question. The question was whether that company makes quarterly reports of its transactions.

Mr. REED. Oh! I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator asked if it was on the list.

Mr. REED. I hope I have made my point clear in saying that from our experience on the Finance Committee I am sure we could not determine the justice or injustice of a tariff rate by an examination of the accounts of one company. Of course, there are some companies, a few, who are the only producers of their particular articles; but that is very unusual. In nearly every case we have been amazed at the large number of concerns that made each of the articles that we were dealing with—some of them successful, some of them just getting along, others in great distress. We can not get a fair picture in regard to any item unless we get them all; and even then we do not know whether their distress, if they are in distress, is due to bad management or to some factor that we can not cope with in a tariff bill, or whether it is due to a difference in the labor cost, which is the only thing that we can cope with.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. EDGE. We also discovered it to be absolutely true that many concerns, particularly the large corporations, manufacture many lines of commodities.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. As I understand, the returns that are filed with the Treasury Department in no way provide for any subdivisions as to the particular profit on those different types of commodities.

Mr. REED. Absolutely not.

Mr. EDGE. When we, as members of the Finance Committee, considered evidence and suggested revision of rates, that revision necessarily had to be based upon the individual commodities, the importations of those commodities, the local production of those commodities, and the exportations of them.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. EDGE. I can not conceive how a copy of the return, as provided on the blanks of the Treasury Department, of a corporation or an individual will give us any of that detailed information bearing upon the individual commodity.

Mr. REED. The Senator is exactly right. I do not like the business of making public tax returns, to be inspected by curious people, by tax experts looking for jobs, and by people who want subscriptions to charities, and all that, but I would not hesitate for a moment to vote for this resolution to make these returns public if I thought it would do any good.

Mr. President, after you have these rather insufficient wage items, after you have the statement whether the taxpayer, in the aggregate, made a profit or a loss, you have not gotten anywhere, because the test is the contrasting wage level. You have to get that by getting down to the labor cost per unit, and you are not going to get that very often out of books.

Take such an illustration as woven silk cloth, made in very large quantities in China. How in the world are we going to get any information about cost records in China? Such records are not kept there. Producers there do not even know what they are. If they are ahead of the game on New Year's Day, it has been a good year. If they are not, there is a loss. But the producers themselves do not go into costs per unit.

If we had all this information that is given here, it would not be useful to us in the task that is ahead of us. What we need is the wage information, which we tried to get in the hearings, and did get pretty successfully, together with the information which the Tariff Commission has given us of the amount of the importations, and on that we can draw some kind of useful conclusion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it should turn out that American manufacturers in some particular industry have been able, through processes of efficiency and good management, to overcome the disadvantage of cheap foreign labor, and, in spite of that, have made profits, and that these tax reports would reveal that fact, would that not assist us in determining whether that particular industry was entitled to more protection in order that it might make more profits, notwithstanding the fact that it might have made sufficient profits by overcoming the disadvantage of foreign labor?

Mr. REED. Of course, we have to take into account the advantages our producers have, which tend to offset the differences in wage costs. Otherwise the rates in this bill would be four or five times as high as they are, if we merely based them on the naked difference in wages.

In India they pay 14 cents a day, on the average, to the common laborer in the steel mills at Tatta. To the same kind of labor here $4 or $4.50 is being paid. We can not base a tariff on that. We find, in looking into it, that the American workman produces three times as much as this underpaid and underfed Indian workman produces. So we have to take account of that. We find that the freight from India to the Atlantic coast or to the Pacific coast is considerable. There is an obstacle to importation, and we have to take account of that. When it is all done, those things are tariff barriers, just as well as is the duty that we levy here.

The upshot of it all is that we are going to try to protect the labor element in our production. It is up to the manufacturer to save his own hide. Beyond that we are not trying to protect him.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will realize that all those who have come before the Finance Committee to testify, whether they were in favor of an increase or a decrease, came voluntarily, in their own behalf, and for more or less selfish motives. Even those who were asking a reduction were asking because they were largely importers and desired to pay less tariff.

Mr. REED. Yes. It is a selfish world. It would fly apart if it were not.

Mr. BARKLEY. So that there was nobody before the committee on any schedule representing the public, in the true sense of the word. Those who asked for increases and those who asked for decreases largely did so because it affected their pocketbooks. I am not criticizing them; it is simply a statement of fact. It is perfectly natural to assume that both those groups put their best foot forward before the committee. They were there as special pleaders for whatever action they were seeking.

The same can not be said of income-tax reports. They are supposed to reveal the true conditions, except in so far as the income-tax payer may be making an effort to shave down, as far as he can, the amount of his net income in order to reduce the amount of his taxes. Is it not possible that a considerable number of these income-tax reports might shed some light upon the question of whether those who came before our committee were always testifying in accordance with the exact facts, or whether they had shaded or colored them in some way in order to influence the committee in its action on this bill?

Mr. REED. I do not think so, Mr. President. It does not seem to me that that gives us any light whatsoever on any question that is before us.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Pennsylvania said that it was most difficult to obtain from foreign sources accurate figures in regard to the cost of production.

Mr. REED. Yes; it is very hard.

Mr. McMASTER. That in many cases the committee simply had to make estimates based upon invoice prices. In view of those statements, and in view of the difficulties the committee has experienced in obtaining the difference in the cost of production in America and abroad, certainly the final, determining result of the effect of a tariff on an industry is the financial condition of that industry. That is the final, determining factor. If the industry is prosperous——

Mr. REED. The Senator says "the industry." The Senator must realize that about 99.9 per cent of the manufacturers of this country produce more than one type of article.

Mr. McMASTER. It is assumed that any industry that is asking for an increase in the duty upon one line of its activities has presented to the Finance Committee accurate data in regard to the cost of production here and abroad.

Mr. KEAN. No; not necessarily.

Mr. McMASTER. Why not?

Mr. KEAN. Because an industry producing a given article in this country does not necessarily know what it costs to produce the same thing abroad.

Mr. McMASTER. Then the basis of the Finance Committee's rate is purely a guess, is it not?

Mr. REED. Not at all.

Mr. McMASTER. As long as we have not accurate information, we have a right in a general way to ascertain the financial condition of a company engaged in the particular line of industry, even though one company may be engaged in different lines of enterprise. There are many, many companies, not all engaged in the same line—that is, corporations manufacturing the same article and that article principally. That information most assuredly would be helpful to the Senate in arriving at its conclusions as to whether or not the industry needs an additional protective duty or tariff.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I do not think it would help one bit. I have tried to explain why I do not think it would.

After all, if we are going to determine our tariff policy by the financial condition of the strongest producers, we are going to do more to give them monopolies than anything else we could do.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further?

Mr. REED. Let me add a sentence, and then I will gladly yield.

Take the steel industry. The Steel Trust, as it is called—the United States Steel Corporation—whose statements are given in full in these manuals, is apparently practically indifferent to the tariff on pig iron and the tariff on steel products. They sent no witnesses. I do not know whether they saw other people privately or not.

Mr. McMASTER. Were they indifferent to the tariff on manganese?

Mr. REED. I do not remember that any person in the Steel Corporation spoke to me about the tariff on manganese since before Judge Gary's death. They certainly sent no one before us in these hearings, and I do not think they spoke to any of us privately.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say this to the Senator, that not one of them came to me and asked me a single thing about the rate.

Mr. REED. I would like to finish my thought, and then I will yield to the Senator from Kentucky, or, if the Senator wants me to, I will yield now.

Mr. BARKLEY. While the Senator is referring to steel, I want to inquire whether the Senator knows whether the United States Steel Corporation had any conversation with smaller producers of steel, by which it was understood that they would come before the committee, if they desired, but that in view of the prejudice in the minds of some against the Steel Corporation, it might be better for them not to appear?

Mr. REED. Of course, I do not know. I can not answer that. But let me go on.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I was perfectly astounded at the statement the Senator made. Do I understand from the statement he made that nobody representing the steel industry had been to see him or the members of the committee with reference to putting manganese on the free list?

Mr. REED. I do not wonder the Senator did not understand my statement, because it was pretty well broken up by interruptions. No; I did not say that. The representatives of the smaller companies came before us and testified under oath, and doubtless talked to us privately every time they could buttonhole us.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not mean to say there was anything wrong about their talking to you. I do not mean to infer that, of course.

Mr. REED. Of course not.

Mr. WHEELER. But I understood the Senator to say they had not talked to anybody.

Mr. REED. I did not say that at all. I started to illustrate by taking the steel industry as a sample.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I would not interrupt the Senator, but I understood him to say that no one connected with the steel industry appeared before the committee.

Mr. REED. No; I did not. I said nobody representing the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. HARRISON. What interest does Mr. Thomas J. Doherty represent?

Mr. REED. Mr. Doherty, I think, represents the Iron and Steel Institute.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not the United States Steel Corporation a member of that institute; and does it not contribute very heavily to it?

Mr. REED. I believe so.

Mr. HARRISON. Did ot Mr. Doherty appear before your subcommittee?

Mr. REED. To that extent, if you consider him a representative of them, of course that is an exception to my statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Did he not recommend an increase on crucible steel?

Mr. REED. I could not hear what the Senator asked about crucible steel.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the subcommittee give the increases he sought?

Mr. REED. The Steel Corporation does not make crucible steel. If Mr. Doherty asked in regard to that—and I do not remember whether he did or not—he certainly was not representing them, because they do not make it.

I beg the Senate to let me finish my thought. You can look at the Steel Corporation's statement which is published in the business manuals and you will find it is very prosperous indeed. Beautifully managed, it has made money consistently year after year. If our thought is going to be that because that company is successful there must not be a duty on steel, we are just doing that much more toward establishing a monopoly for that company, we are making it impossible for the little fellows to start in. There are lots of them, and they are scattered all around the United States. Some of them down in Texas came before us to testify. The very first thing that would result from cutting out the duty on steel products because the Steel Corporation is prosperous would be to annihilate all those little fellows, and leave the Steel Corporation more supreme in the field.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I am trying to apply the Senator's own thought.

Mr. McMASTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. He is simply interpreting my thought. I have not expressed my thought in regard to the particular subject which the Senator is discussing.

In regard to the steel proposition, he has taken a very unusual example, a very unusual example. But there are many instances in this country where there are larger factors in the industry, and then there are smaller factors. The question here is not as to whether all of the small people, those who are not making profits, shall be crushed out. It is certainly within the province of the Senate to ascertain whether or not they are using the most up-to-date and efficient methods, or whether the American public is being asked to pay for inefficiency. In order to ascertain, first, whether there are companies that are not making money, we have to have these income statements. After we can ascertain the names of those companies, we can easily go further, possibly, if there is information obtainable in regard to their methods, their efficiency methods, or in regard to other facts as to whether they are overcapitalized, as to whether they watered their stock, or many of those factors which may be taken into consideration. So I do not think there is anything harmful in obtaining this information, and I think the Senator will admit that in many instances along those lines it would be helpful.

Mr. REED. I do not think anything is helpful that wastes a whole lot of time without doing any good. I do not think anything is helpful that makes public the private records of the people whom we are taxing. I do not see any useful purpose to be served in getting a statement of the aggregate profit or loss of single producers. That is why I am opposed to it.

Furthermore, and I am about to conclude, the unfairness of the thing shows in that the resolution, either with or without the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, does not pretend to ask for the income-tax returns of the importers of the same articles. Is not that just as important or are we simply using the producers as our target? Must we wage war on one side and not on both sides? If it is so important and helpful to get the manufacturers' income-tax returns, why not get a little help from the importers' income-tax returns?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator agree to accept the proposition if we would agree to accept an amendment of that nature?

Mr. REED. No; I do not think it would do any good. I will not vote for it in any form, because I think it is time wasting and money wasting, and it is going to produce no useful information. If there is any use in it, we can get it right now out of the manuals which show the affairs of these corporations in great detail and in far greater detail than the income-tax returns would show them.

Mr. McMASTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. McMASTER. If the Senator will look through a number of the pages in the manuals to which he refers he will find that corporation after corporation does not give the items contained in the income-tax returns. In going through page after page of these manuals I find that only 1 in 3 or 1 in 4 gives a complete financial statement.

Mr. REED. And the little holding companies or leased companies are very briefly referred to, and nobody would ever look for them anyway.

I do not see why the resolution does not include importers. Take the cement companies again. Is it not interesting for us in legislating for the future to know how much of a margin the foreign importer has on the cement which he is bringing in? If we are selling at our manufacturing cost or below it, which is true along the Atlantic coast to-day in cement, would it not be helpful to us to know how much the importers are making at that price? Why, then, should not the resolution call for their returns also? I think if it should, however, it would be just that injustice applied to many more people; but it is certainly inconsistent not to ask for it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the larger the profits of the importer, the smaller the difference between the cost of production abroad and at home as affecting the American producer? In other words, when the importer charges a large profit he helps bridge the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, when the article reaches the consumer.

Mr. REED. Of course, the importer is human and he will get all the profit he can.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would really shed no light on the plight of the American consumer if he asks for increased protection.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean that if an article is imported at $1 and sold at $2 and that is the American cost, there is no occasion for any tariff protection?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not say that. I say if the importer is absorbing the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad then the American producer is not in such a terrible plight.

Mr. REED. Of course he is, because the importer will always cut his price just low enough to get the business; and if he has such an enormous profit as all that, then——

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not intimating the importers are getting an undue profit. I can understand that there is not as much relevancy attaching to the income-tax return of an importer who is asking nothing of the Congress in the way of protection as there is to the income-tax return of a manufacturer who is asking something.

Mr. REED. The importers are asking a great deal of the Congress. They are asking in nearly every case to reduce the amount of protection that we think ought to be given to the American workingman. On every schedule there were swarms of importers here testifying. The Senator has no idea how valuable this secrecy is to those men. I remember one importer who declined to tell us publicly the amount of his importations or his gross sales in this country. He wrote it down on a tiny piece of paper, handed it privately to the members of the committee, and then carefully got it back and tore it up. He was not willing to have his competitors know the amount of his gross sales. He took all that elaborate precaution to keep it secret.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator refers to a competing importer, but not to a competing manufacturer in the American field.

Mr. REED. How is that importer going to feel when his whole business is dragged out in public—and it ought to be if we are going to do that with the manufacturer. How is the manufacturer going to feel when all his business secrets are laid out before the eyes of his competitors? The Senator is going to do him a lot of harm without doing us any good if he undertakes to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. That particular importer would assume the same attitude toward that report that the Senator from Pennsylvania is assuming, notwithstanding the fact that the law which we enacted in 1926, repealing the publicity of income-tax returns, specifically provides for the very thing we are now asking.

Mr. REED. No; it does not, and I am glad the Senator mentioned that law. The act of 1926 specifically provides for the production of such income-tax returns in executive session of the committee and not to be broadcast to the world.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator took advantage of my mention of the act of 1926. The law now is the act of 1928.

Mr. REED. I am talking about the present law, the law now in effect.

Mr. BARKLEY. It provides that the Senate Committee on Finance or the House Committee on Ways and Means or any joint committee of the two Houses may receive the information and may make it public to the extent that they think it necessary or desirable or of benefit to the Congress in the passage of legislation.

Mr. REED. That is true, but the Senator is proposing to change that law by providing that a minority or a majority, and not the committee as a whole, may do this, and may make it public. Before we got through we would have a serious question whether the Senate by Senate resolution could modify the law of 1928.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no provision in the pending resolution that the information shall be made public. It is to be obtained for the use of the Senate in the determination of the matter of taxation. I can not imagine a more relevant request for information of this sort than in the preparation of a tariff bill, even much more so than I would consider it to be relevant in the preparation of an internal revenue tax bill, because the amount of profits made by a corporation may have no bearing whatever on the rates of tax that ought to be levied against the profits of the corporation, whereas the amount of profits made by corporations engaged in American industry may have some bearing on whether or not they are entitled to an increase in tariff rates.

Mr. REED. I am not at all concerned whether they are entitled to it or not, but whether their workmen are entitled to it or not, and this would give no light whatsoever that will guide on that question.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator said the only thing of interest was whether or not the workingmen are entitled to it. Would it not be interesting if we showed that some of those corporations were making tremendous profits and at the same time were paying their employees very poor wages?

Mr. REED. Of course it would be interesting.

Mr. WHEELER. Would it not be material in determining whether or not a tariff bill ought to be passed giving them further protection? Here are some concerns, for instance, in the textile industry. For illustration, let us assume that some of them are making huge profits, but are paying their employees niggardly wages. I do not assert that they are, but I say let us assume it, and that they are coming here asking the Congress of the United States to give them increases in tariff protection. Would the Senator say in the face of such circumstances as that that we should not be entitled to that information, and that if they were making huge profits and were not paying their employees proper wages, we ought to give them more tariff or any tariff at all?

Mr. REED. The best answer to that is that the working people of America, by their representatives, have studied this subject quite as hard as we have, and they have just as definite views on it. The representatives of organized labor who came before us told eloquently of their belief that this project of protection is warranted and is very greatly desired by them.

Mr. WHEELER. But that does not answer my question at all. That does not even attempt to answer my question. I asked the Senator a specific question.

Mr. REED. I do not get much of a chance to answer the Senator's questions.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator comes back and says that the only answer to it is that the representatives of organized labor came before us and that they asked for it. The Senator knows perfectly well that in many instances some of the representatives of organized labor perhaps did not have any information as to the profits their employer was making, and the only thing they went by was what their employers told them. The Senator knows that in many instances some of the employees were on the pay roll of the company when they came before the Senate committee to give that information.

Mr. REED. I do not believe that Matthew Woll was on the pay roll of any company when he came here.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know that he was, but with all due respect to Matthew Woll, as long as we are on that subject, everybody knows that he has been a propagandist for the high protectionists for a long, long period of time. I do not think, if you want my opinion about it, that Matthew Woll speaks for the great rank and file of working men of the country.

Mr. REED. He thought he did and we thought he did, but possibly the Senator from Montana knows that he did not.

Mr. WHEELER. There is no doubt that he thinks he does, but anybody who is in close contact with the labor movement throughout the country knows he does not speak for it.

Mr. REED. I think he spoke for the Federation of Wage Earners—I believe that was the name of the group of representatives of labor who were here. No one appeared to tell us that Mr. Woll did not represent labor and nobody else appeared to claim that he did, and until the Senator told us now we have all been laboring under the same delusion as Mr. Woll, that he does represent American labor—and he does it mighty well, I will say.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; I have not any doubt that from the standpoint of the Senator he does represent labor in this country very well. But I am simply saying that when the Senator says no other representative of labor came, because he did not have the great mass of labor coming here to tell him their views upon the tariff, it was because in many instances they did not have money enough to pay their car fare to come here and tell about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must remember, however, that Mr. Flynn came before the committee.

Mr. REED. Yes; he came before the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. He is a labor representative. Does not he represent labor?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know Mr. Flynn.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only did he come before the committee as the representative of labor, but he also referred to the testimony of Mr. Woll and sanctioned the testimony given by Mr. Woll.

Mr. REED. And nobody contradicted it. I said no representative of labor came to contradict the statement that Mr. Woll was speaking for organized labor in America.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate, especially with a discussion of the individual rates contained in the tariff bill, but I am interested to ascertain at least to my own satisfaction the basis upon which the tariff bill, not only as amended by the Senate Finance Committee, but as passed by the House, has been framed.

There are many provisions of the pending bill with which the Senate Committee on Finance did not deal to the extent of making any changes, and we need not delude ourselves with the belief that the consideration of the bill will be limited to the amendments reported by the Senate committee. Every item of the bill which involves an increase in cost to the American consumer is entitled to fair consideration on its merits. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not propose to commit myself as to any individual item in the bill, for I desire to consider the items on their merits when we reach them in a discussion of the changes proposed by the Senate committee of the original provisions of the bill as passed by the other House.

In connection with the solicitude of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] as to the welfare of American labor, I should like to have information that would convince me that the American laboring man is now getting his share of the profits of American industry; and I am not certain that the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate or before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives fully disclose whether or not he is receiving his share.

In the revenue act of 1922, I think it was, we provided for a certain kind of publicity of income-tax returns; but that is not involved in the pending resolution. There is no question here as to whether we are going back, by some circumvention, to the practice of making income-tax returns public through a resolution of the Senate or by request of the Senate committee. My recollection is that I voted for the repeal of that provision and voted for the one now contained in the act of 1926. Why did we provide that the Finance Committee and Ways and Means Committee or a joint committee of the two Houses might request income-tax returns or any fact disclosed in them?

There are two or three ways by which income-tax returns may be obtained. Section 257 (a) of the act of 1926—it might be well to read it, in order that we may understand just what it is we are driving at—provides:

> Returns upon which the tax has been determined by the commissioner shall constitute public records; but, except as hereinafter provided in this section and section 1203, they shall be open to inspection only upon order of the President and under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary and approved by the President. Whenever a return is open to the inspection of any person a certified copy thereof shall, upon request, be furnished to such person under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. The commissioner may prescribe a reasonable fee for furnishing such copy.

There is nothing in that paragraph which provides that a person who is furnished with a certified copy of an income-tax return shall keep it forever secret; there is nothing in the paragraph which prohibits him from making it public, if he desires to do so, except the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, probably under a regulation, to prevent him from doing it. Subsection (b) (1) provides:

> (b) (1) The Secretary and any officer or employee of the Treasury Department, upon request from the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Finance of the Senate, or a select committee of the Senate or House specially authorized to investigate returns by a resolution of the Senate or House, or a joint committee so authorized by concurrent resolution, shall furnish such committee sitting in executive session with any data of any character contained in or shown by any return.

Subsection (2) provides:

> Any such committee shall have the right, acting directly as a committee, or by or through such examiners or agents as it may designate or appoint, to inspect any or all of the returns at such times and in such manner as it may determine.

Subsection (3) provides:

> Any relevant or useful information thus obtained may be submitted by the committee obtaining it to the Senate or the House, or to both the Senate and the House, as the case may be.

In other words, it would not have been necessary for the resolution now pending to be offered if the Senate Committee on Finance had taken the initiative and had sought the information contained in the income-tax returns in an effort to guide it in determining what rates should be levied on imports into the United States. The committee had the power to do it; it has not been done; no effort has been made on the part of the Finance Committee to secure those returns. The tariff bill is now pending here on report from that committee. The Senate certainly has the right to instruct its committee to seek this information; and I should like to know where more justification might be found for seeking this information than in the construction and consideration of a tariff bill.

The amount of profits made by a corporation would shed very little light upon the rate of taxation that ought to be levied upon the profits of corporations in the framing of an internal revenue law. The only possible use that such information could be to the Senate or to the House of Representatives, so far as legislation is concerned, would be either in the framing of an income tax law or in the framing of a tariff bill; and I think we have a right to the information in either case. The situation that confronts us now is that we have a tariff bill under consideration. I dare say that not one-tenth of 1 per cent of the corporations that filed income-tax returns in the period covered by the resolution either came before the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Ways and Means or sent any representative to testify before those committees. Whether it be kept secret by the committee or not—and it may be a matter of indifference as to whether it is kept secret or is imparted to the Senate as provided in the law—the information could be obtained and considerable light might be shed upon the justice of the proposed increases in tariff rates, not only as reported in the Senate committee amendments but as adopted by the House of Representatives itself, by the information that might be disclosed from all the other hundreds of thousands of returns of corporations which gave no testimony before the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Ways and Means.

If it be objected that the Finance Committee would make the information public, I suggest that it can only do so by imparting the information to the Senate. Of course, the Senate's proceedings are public; whatever information is imparted to the Senate by a committee is made a matter of public record and in that way there might be involved indirectly the question of making public information that otherwise would be secret; but the Senate and the House had their eyes open when they adopted this provision. They certainly had some meritorious object in view when they provided that the Senate Committee on Finance or the Ways and Means Committee of the House, respectively, might reveal the information obtained to the Senate or the House. I submit that it is no objection to this resolution that the Senate Committee on Finance may reveal the information to the Senate and I can imagine that there would be no good purpose served in withholding it from the Senate. So I feel that the resolution ought to be adopted in the amended form, because the mere report of profits and losses of given companies may shed no real light upon the picture.

I have no preconceived prejudice whatever against any of the rates provided in the pending bill. I desire to consider them on their merits, and if I am convinced of the justice of any rate I shall not hesitate to vote for it; but I want to be convinced of the justice of it; I want to be convinced that the great American people are receiving a square deal, because, as always occurs in such hearings, they were not represented either in the hearings which were held by the Committee on Ways and Means or those held by the Committee on Finance, for neither of those committees heard anybody except those who voluntarily came before them. No summons was issued by the committee to anybody representing any interest to come before the committee and testify. Those who came before us came because they were interested either in high rates or in low rates from the standpoint of the effect that such rates should have upon their business. All of their statements were ex parte, except in so far as the committee itself, with such information as it had at hand and with the assistance of the experts of the Tariff Commission—whose assistance, I want to say publicly, was very valuable; almost invaluable, so far as I was personally concerned—was able to present the other side. I should like to have some information obtained from sources which are not financially interested in the results of the committee's deliberations and in the result of the Senate's deliberations; and it may be that these returns may shed considerable light upon the fairness and justice of the rates which are proposed in this bill. For that reason I hope that the resolution of the Senator from North Carolina as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Wisconsin will be adopted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It may be interesting at this point in the Senator's remarks to take note of the fact that in the message which the President communicated to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of the first session of the Seventy-first Congress he defines the rule which, in his opinion, should determine the necessity for revision.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will be glad to have the Senator read that in my time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On page 4 of the pamphlet in which his message is printed this language is found:

> It would seem to me that the test of necessity for revision is in the main whether there has been a substantial slackening of activity in an industry during the past few years and a consequent decrease of employment due to insurmountable competition in the products of that industry. It is not as if we were setting up a new basis of protective duties. We did that seven years ago. What we need to remedy now is whatever substantial loss of employment may have resulted from shifts since that time.

That is a very different test concerning the necessity for tariff revision from that asserted by the Senator from Pennsylvania; and in this test it seems to me that the President does indicate his opinion that there is a close relationship between the information called for by the resolution and the amendment to it and the question as to the necessity for changes in the present tariff law.

Mr. BARKLEY. And we can not apply the President's test by taking the testimony of interested witnesses before the Finance Committee or the Committee on Ways and Means, because in the very nature of the case they were special pleaders; they were seeking action by the committee and by Congress that would very materially affect their financial welfare. I do not criticize them for that; I would not criticize them for doing what, in all probability, I would do if I were in the same situation; but we are not acting here as the agents of special pleaders either for or against increases in tariff rates. We are supposed to act as a deliberative body, undertaking to weigh the testimony of those asking for and those opposing increases in rates, and we can not apply the test which was laid down by the President, and which I think under the present circumstances is a fair test, simply by taking the testimony of those who came before the committee and testified according to what they thought they needed in order that rates might be either increased or decreased.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator implies that the question as to whether there has been a slackening of industry may not be conclusively determined by the statements of those directly concerned in the industry. It may also be illuminated by the profits, the losses, the employment conditions that affect the industry; and those things would be reflected in the income-tax returns.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. Furthermore, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that my understanding even of the theory of protection has always been that it is not based upon the condition of a few isolated industries or parts of a given industry but that it is based upon the condition, the welfare, or the merits of an industry as a whole. You can not single out 10, 20, or 50 individual concerns representing any given industry where there are a thousand concerns involved and say that you can base a fair and just tariff upon the testimony of those who are sufficiently interested or sufficiently inefficient or unwise in their management as to make it necessary for them to come before a committee and lay before Congress reasons why some special favor ought to be granted to them.

My understanding of the theory of protection is that an average is taken of the whole industry of the United States—the good and the bad—to determine whether or not that industry as a whole is entitled to the protection which you advocate and which you seek to give it. If you raise rates high enough to make it possible for the unprosperous, the badly managed, the badly located industry to make a profit, then you make those rates too high for the average or for the extremely prosperous industry.

The hearings before the committee may not reveal a true basis for a tariff rate upon an industry as a whole, and in the absence of any other testimony we may be compelled to adopt the testimony of those who have voluntarily come before the committee; but there is other testimony, and it may be better testimony, upon which the Senate ought to act, and that testimony may be disclosed by an inspection of the reports of the corporations—not 5 or 10 or 20 of them, but all of those involved in any given industry—to determine whether the rates are fair.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], for whom I have the greatest personal regard and political and official respect, this morning took the position that we need not obtain this information from the Treasury Department, because he had a list of 240 or 250 corporations that make reports in the newspapers every three months. If the Senator from Utah were not such a profound statesman I should say that that is a joke. The idea that Members of the United States Senate are expected to go around over the country and find all the daily issues of newspapers to find out how much any corporation reported on the 1st day of last April, or the 1st day of July, or the 1st day of September is a new proposition in legislation to me; and the same thing may be said of the book that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has produced here.

How many Senators have that book? How many have ever seen it? It is published largely for the benefit of men engaged in financial transactions upon the stock exchanges—bankers and banks—that desire to know the financial condition of corporations at any particular time. Certainly, however, the Senator from Pennsylvania would not seriously contend that the information contained in those books is official; and I take it for granted that he would not seriously contend that every Member of the Senate ought to take the time to go out in the market and purchase one of these reports, with thousands of pages in it, and take it home and study it assiduously in order that he may obtain the information, and after he has obtained it be compelled to admit that it is not official, when there is official information in the Treasury Department as to all the matters about which we seek information. There is not a lawyer in this body or in any courthouse who would advocate the acceptance of such testimony as that when there is official testimony on record that discloses the real facts without equivocation or question.

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate any longer. It seems to me perfectly ridiculous for us to be asked to go out individually and make a search of newspapers to secure information which is in the Treasury Department and which under the law we have a right to request, and which is requested under the resolution offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If these industries are suffering, if they are not making profits, would not the best place in the world to ascertain their true condition, to find out accurately whether they need greater largesses and greater rates of tariff from the Government, be their income-tax returns?

Mr. BARKLEY. I should say so, unless we assume something that I do not assume—that they did not make accurate and correct returns to the Treasury Department. I think we may assume in the case of corporations, as we assume in our own individual cases, that they do not make out their reports so as to pay any more taxes than they think they ought to pay under the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, surely they would not; and if they are in a bad condition these returns would necessarily show it, in my judgment. I should think our friends on the other side desiring to make a bad case for the industries of the country, desiring to show that they are not in a prosperous condition, would be happy to turn to these income-tax returns to show that condition accurately to the public if it is as bad as they portray it to be.

Mr. BARKLEY. So far as a comparison may be had between the information supplied by the Treasury Department and the information contained in the two financial reports referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I think a casual perusal of those books will show that they do not contain any information that sheds light upon the problem we are seeking to solve. Those books contain information as to the home office of the company, the transfer agent in New York, the amount of preferred and common stock outstanding and that which has been authorized and is not yet outstanding, the percentage of dividends, if any, declared upon the preferred and common stock, and that is about all the information they contain, except the nature of the company's business.

The percentage of dividends paid by a company may not always be a true test of its prosperity. There are some companies that have continued to pay dividends out of surpluses accumulated in previous years. There are other companies that are not by any means paying out all of their profits in annual dividends. So it can not be contended that the reports referred to contain the information sought by the Senate; and I insist that the Senate has a right to the information. It can not be presumed that we are seeking it for any ulterior or any unfair motive or purpose unless we are ready to assume that Congress passed this law in the first place with some ulterior motive, or some design to do by indirection that which we did not have the courage to do by direction.

I hope the amendment will be adopted and the resolution will be agreed to.
